Covington, Jeanette & Taylor, Ralph (Dept Sociology Rutgers U., New Brunswick NJ 08873). Neighborhood Revitalization and Crime.

¶ Based on recent developments of the rational offender perspective, ecological considerations, & recent gentrification research, it is hypothesized that gentrification would be associated with increasing robbery & larceny & decreasing burglary. When gentrifying neighborhoods in Baltimore, Md., were compared to other revitalizing or appreciating neighborhoods, it was observed that gentrifying neighborhoods experienced significant unexpected increases in robbery & larceny. The ecological characteristics of gentrifying neighborhoods suggest explanations for this linkage: despite dramatic increases in relative house value & increasing owner occupancy, gentrifying neighborhoods remain heterogeneous in terms of both population & housing stock & remain similar to typical inner-city neighborhoods in several respects. These results suggest that typical ecological processes of invasion-succession have not, & may not, reach completion in gentrifying neighborhoods, thus, these locations may remain vulnerable to continuing high levels of disorder.

¶ A recent theme in family sociology has been that while the US family has been buffeted by major social, economic, & demographic change over the past two decades, it has survived as a strong & viable institution. While most of this work has emphasized the younger family, examined here is the impact of major social changes on the family structure & relationships of older persons. Of particular note are the effects of changes in divorce & mortality rates on the survival of marital relationships; fertility & mortality trends on the existence of children & siblings, & changing numbers of children & residential patterns on the interaction of older parents & their children. The analysis results in projections for the future availability of kin & the potential for family interaction of older people. Data from the 1984 National Health Interview Survey Sup-

¶ An examination of how gender, SC, & career intersect in the lives of U.S. & Mc women participating in volunteer & philanthropic activities based on interviews conducted with 70 Fs chosen by the reputational sampling method. The worldview of these privileged women is evident in the priorities of their interests: responsibility to family, responsible SC interests, noblesse oblige, & responsibility to self. Women connect these interests as they weigh contingencies, e.g., considering whether not their career concerns may be seen as a threat to powerful men of their SC. The concept of career provides the unifying thread to together the configuration of family & SC interests, community service, individual aspirations.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 1 pp.

¶ Bringing together concerns in the sociology of religion & feminism, the question of whether women & men have distinct ways of experiencing & talking about religion is explored. Recent work by Carol L. Gagan & others in the "self-in-relation" approach to women's development suggests that women see themselves as more interconnected with others than do men, who have a more independent or disconnected sense of self. Based on interview data from secular Jewish women & men who became Orthodox (N not given), the question of whether women's accounts of their conversion experiences are more likely to emphasize relational themes than men's is examined. The findings depart from the expectations in the literature in two significant ways: the men, just like the women, emphasize family & community as major factors in their attraction to Orthodoxy. This finding is similar to that in recent work on Evangelical Christians but very distinct from what would be expected on the basis of "self-in-relation" feminist thought. Second, the men were much more likely than the women to profess belief in God & to highlight that salient dimension in their conversion to Orthodoxy. Some possible explanations for these findings are explored & future directions for research are proposed.

Empirical studies that have utilized this approach are examined, & a theoretical critique of the network perspective is developed, stressing its inadequate conceptualization of human agency & motivation. Only when the network approach is complemented by an interpretive mode of analysis can it contribute to the task of explaining social behavior.

- 1 A nontraditional approach is used to address two recent criticisms of life events research: operational confounding & disaggregation. The role of psychological factors & social support in the relationship of life events & depression among older adults is examined by focusing on a single most important life event. Analysis of data from a random community sample of 1,200 adults (aged 50+) collected in upstate NY reveals that while health-related events do exacerbate the level of depression evidenced subsequent to experiencing an undesirable life event, their exclusion from the analysis still results in a significant relationship between non-health-related events & depressive symptomatology. Controlling for both types of undesirable life events, it is documented that psychological factors (eg, expectation of & control over the event) are more effective in predicting subsequent level of depression for those experiencing non-health-related undesirable life events. However, social support is important in predicting subsequent symptomatology: those who reported that they needed help with the life event but did not receive it were almost twice as depressed as those who reported they needed help & did get it.

- 1 Adequate cultural accounts of institutional behavior require a framework that specifies how organizations notice, interpret, & appropriate elements of their cultural context &, in doing so, help to reproduce & transform their environment. Viewed from this perspective, organizations are not simply passive recipients of cultural inputs, but are both culturally constituting & constituted. This argument is advanced through a comparative examination of commercial blood plasma centers & popular science publications. Both organizations recognized that their profitability was endangered by questions of legitimacy; selling blood, like peddling truths, is a culturally questionable enterprise. In defining & reacting to these problems, these organizations appropriated cultural resources in an effort to trade on the legitimacy of related institutions. In each case, this appropriation sharpened contradictions among values &, in the process, transformed the problems confronted by the organizations.

Estes, Carroll L. (Dept Social & Behavioral Sciences U California, San Francisco 94143). The Biomedicalization of Aging: Dangers and Dilemmas.

- 1 The institution of medicine has become a pervasive force in the conceptualization, definition, & treatment of many aspects of social life. One area of its growing influence & dominance is the field of aging. The germ theory & the great success attributed to medicine in controlling infectious disease & increasing the lifespan have reinforced the power of the medical model focused on individual organic pathology & physiological etiologies & biomedical interventions. The resulting "biomedicalization of aging" socially constructs old age as a process of decremental physical decline (illness, disability, & death), places aging under the domain & control of biomedicine, assigns medicine responsibility for its treatment & cure, & shapes the nation's research, education, & policy agendas. Two aspects of the phenomenon are important to note: biomedicine itself is a social construction, albeit one that has consistently demonstrated the power to extend the boundaries of its domain considerably, & there is substantial research demonstrating the import of social factors in both the aging process & societal aging. Following a review of recent developments in aging research, training, & policy in the context of the literature on medicalization & demedicalization, social control, & the medical-industrial complex, personal research on the medicalization of services to the elderly is discussed.

An overview of recent trends, particularly in nonprofit health & social services, is drawn on to examine how larger economic, political, & sociocultural crises are being displaced into & processed through the nonprofit sector: the attendant dilemmas & contradictions, & how the nonprofit sector may be contributing to crisis as well as reflecting it. The relations between the nonprofit sector, capital, & the state are explored & two hypotheses advanced: that the nonprofit sector both acts as a buffer absorbing crisis, & provides one "solution" to the current crisis & the restructuring of capital.

- 1 Using the health care services utilization framework (Aday, Lu Ann, & Andersen, Ronald, Development of Indices of Access to Medical Care, Ann Arbor: Health Administration Press, 1975), the hypothesis is tested that the people who drop out of longitudinal studies are the people that the researchers are most interested in, ie, those who are in the poorest health & who are the heaviest users of health care services. Data on 3,013 noninstitutionalized older Fs who were interviewed in the 1969-1979 Social Security Administration's Longitudinal Retirement History Survey (SSAIRHS) were used. Of the original Rs, 1,119 dropped out of the survey before 1979. T-test analysis confirms that those who dropped out were less healthy & used more hospital & MD services in 1969 than those who did not drop out. Multiple regression confirms that the health care services utilization framework explains more of the varitial sciences speaks to Harold Garfinkel's ethnomethodology. In conclusion, an inquiry is made into the grounds for Habermas's belief in the emancipatory cognitive interest of a critical social science. Autonomy & responsibility are two compelling principles in the social sciences, but how do they come together to represent one unified human interest? Thomas Hobbes shows that the development of responsibility involves the loss of autonomy. Jean Jacques Rousseau argues that responsibility must defer to the original human interest in autonomy. Autonomy & responsibility are strange bedfellows & this gloss in Habermas's work is considered. At several points, the epistemology of Habermas is juxtaposed with the platonic discussion of the relation between wisdom & knowledge.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

¶ The field of politics of education has broken substantially with educators' naive, & even hypocritical, assertion that they are not political actors, but it has failed to provide a sufficiently rich analysis of their political role. Three deficiencies, in particular, are highlighted: (1) paying insufficient attention to educators' role as political mobilizers & not just bureaucratic & interest group politicians, (2) missing educators' ideological role as framers of certain views of the desirable functions, form, & governance of education that powerfully condition noneducators' & educators' actions, & (3) ignoring the role of educators' self-interests in their policy actions. These gaps in understanding are addressed by examining the political role of educators in the nationwide movement since 1900 to establish community Colls. & the current educational reform movement of the 1980s.

Dubin, Steven C. (State U. New York, Purchase 10577), Visual Onomatopoeia.

¶ "Visual onomatopoeia" assembles large numbers of individuals via group insignias, emblems, or other significant symbols, thus achieving social solidarity & group identity as both act & artifact. The artistic or photographic record of such displays is tangible evidence of a group's existence. "Living photographs" of religious & patriotic subjects (eg, 18,000 men configured as the Statue of Liberty) were executed by the team of Mole & Thomas & by F. O. Goldbeck between 1913 & 1948. From a Durkheimian perspective, such images can be considered an important device for mobilizing allegiance. However, from a Goffmanian perspective, it is demonstrated that there is also affective deviance from affirmative social rituals: participants were not as fully engaged as their organizers might have desired. Additional examples from the mass media (eg, advertising, news reports) demonstrate the metaphoric use of this device & attest to the subtle pervasiveness of this means of representing social life.

Eder, Donna J. & Enke, Janet (Dept Sociology Indiana U, Bloomington 47405), Gossip as a Means for Strengthening Social Bonds: A Sociolinguistic Approach.

¶ The way in which gossip is used by adolescent girls to clarify both social relationships & social norms is examined. Three researchers observed peer group interaction during lunch periods in a middle school over a 3-year period. Once rapport was established, 8 conversations in each of 8 groups were audio- or videotaped. All gossip episodes, as recorded in these transcripts & in field notes, were analyzed. It was found that gossip in which there was a high degree of expressed agreement helped to strengthen the social relations of these girls & reinforce social boundaries between groups. In addition, it was found that the degree of expressed agreement was greater if: (1) the first response to the initial evaluative statement was supportive vs contradictory, (2) the peer group was a stable friendship group, (3) the girls already had some degree of consensus about the subject matter of the gossip, & (4) the target of gossip was a nongroup member.

¶ The impact of involvement in a variety of extracurricular activities on early adolescents' popularity & sociability is examined, using longitudinal ethnographic & sociometric questionnaire data (N = 636 Rs) from 3 midwestern middle schools with 270-750 students. It was found the popularity at the middle-school level is based primarily on visibility & "being known" by other students. The extracurricular activities that produced the highest degree of visibility in middle school are cheerleading for Fs & basketball for Ms. F sports had mixed effects on F popularity, but did increase the number of friendships they had, as did musical activities in the smaller schools. Athletic activities were consistently important for increasing both the status & sociability of Ms. It is concluded that while athletic activities still do not provide Fs with the same achievement related avenues for status that they do for Ms, they do provide them with important opportunities for making friends.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 11 pp.

¶ An analysis of the understandings & symbols that emerged & penetrated Spanish society after Francisco Franco's death, enabling a successful transition to democracy. Spanish newspaper reports of three critical moments of consensus: the first democratic elections of June 1977, the drafting of the Moncloa Pacts of Oct 1977, & the drafting of the 1978 Constitution are analyzed using a method of textual interpretation (Ricoeur, Paul, 1971 [full reference not provided]). It is found that collective understandings emerged regarding a new beginning, the Civil War, national reconciliation, & democracy. While intertwined in diverse political-ideological frameworks, these understandings transcended social groups & assisted in forming a common cultural system. They also correspond to the process of transition outlined by Victor Turner (1977) in which the phases of separation, liminality, & reaggregation enable transformation from one social state to another.

¶ Two introspective narratives about different experiences concerning sex & death are examined, allowing a discussion of parallels in emotion work strategies, the process of role distance & role-person merger, & the strategies used to manage encounters that are unpleasant & undermine identity & meaning. These accounts are useful for studying the lived experience of emotion, role making, & meaning construction in everyday life, as well as for their description of intense, emotional settings. They provide sociologists with a basis for the examination of interactional processes & for making a link from the microprocesses described here to larger issues such as the role of power in relationships, cultural conditioning of emotion, & sex roles & identity in general. The similarities of emotions felt & expressed, & the work done on them in the diverse arenas explored here, suggest patterns in emotional responses that are not caused by the objects of the emotions: sex & death.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 21 pp.

¶ The decline in women's participation in the European Waldensian medieval heretical sect is analyzed in the context of Max Weber's notion of routinization of charisma. Weber's theory provides a useful backdrop for explaining why women were increasingly excluded from priestly roles as the organization of the Waldensians, founded in Lyon, France, in 1173, grew larger & more complex. To investigate this trend more closely, original documents & secondary sources are examined, including Inquisition materials, writings by Catholic clerics, & correspondence between members of the Waldensian sect. Through an analysis of the portions of these documents relating to the organization of the sect, the priestly & leadership offices, & women's participation in the sect, the idea that men throughout the entire organization purposefully excluded women from priestly roles is disputed. In particular, the timing of events relating to the organizational development of the sect & the diffuse nature of the organization would have prevented organization-wide purposeful exclusion. Other reasons for the decline in women's roles are discussed.

 * An examination of problems that plagued the Cuban economy from the mid-1970s to at least 1986, when the revolutionary leadership launched a rectification drive to address them. Based on information from Cuban government documents, journals, & newspapers, & a host of English-language secondary sources, it is argued that these problems stemmed from patterns of bureaucratic centralist behavior for making & implementing economic & other decisions favored by the revolutionary leadership. It is also argued that, although the 1986 rectification drive is likely to lessen the propensity for bureaucratic centralist behavior in Cuba, it is unlikely to eliminate it. The work of the Hungarian economist János Kornai on socialist economies is used to identify structural factors, group interest factors that account for the propensity for bureaucratic centralist behavior in Cuba are also identified. Debates about the Cuban economy in particular & about the contradictions of socialist economies in general are discussed.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 25 pp.

* The orthodox concept of resources found in sociological theory, human ecology, & environmental sociology is examined with reference to the debate on limits to economic growth. The orthodox concept is that resources are material or symbolic stock that has value for production or consumption, in pursuit of the wants or subsistence of individuals or corporate entities, & is subject to supply & demand from public or private sources. It is argued this concept limits understanding of how human social systems are organized by resource dynamics. So, a generalized concept of resource functions is described. Resource functions are not conceived as public or private property nor as separate from what they sustain. They are conceived as the stuff of ecological & social interaction. Thus being, human social relations, structures, & organizations are more than adaptations to resource environments. They are adaptations of them.

Friedman, Jennifer (Dept Sociology U South Florida, Tampa 33620), Mothers and Daughters: Negotiation for Control over Their Lives.

* An exploration of the negotiation processes between mothers & daughters, based on data from 22 interviews with mothers & 32 with adolescent daughters (including 20 mother-daughter sets), representing white, black, & Hispanic racial groups in a midwestern city. Research tends to show that mothers limit their daughters' behaviors to protect their daughters in addition to their own images (Hammer, 1975). The data show that mothers & daughters bargain with each other about these limits in an attempt to maintain control over their own status transitions, including statuses in terms of the family life cycle. Mothers create rules & influence their daughters' career paths to prevent their daughters' involvement in activities such as sex, drugs, & alcohol. The restrictions that mothers impose, & their daughters' acceptances of these rules, determine the rate at which daughters & mothers transform their statuses. Mothers, seeking to maintain their status, want their daughters to grow up slowly, but daughters want to become adults, they negotiate with each other to try to control their age grade transitions. Their statuses are interdependent, & only one person can really control the transitions, the other has no choice but to accept.

* While leadership in voluntary organizations is important to the understanding of voluntary action, not enough is known about differences between leaders & members in such organizations. Using discriminant function analysis on demographic characteristics, social-psychological variables, & cost-benefit relationships, it was found that leaders differ significantly from members in several of these areas in both Israel & the US. Patterns of greatest similarity were found between the US & Israeli participants on social-psychological variables. Gender distinguished members from leaders in Israel, occupation & education did so in the US. An insightful finding in the area of costs & benefits is that leaders perceived their activism as more costly than did members, leaders viewed costs to their participation as equal with benefits, while members perceived more benefits than costs.

* The temporary help industry has developed to increase flexibility for US business & labor. Here, the temporary worker is examined in a comparative & historic framework in order to describe the newest forms of temporary help, including staffing, temporary professionals, & a core-ring concept. Business decisions to use temporaries are explored & preconditions for temporary use identified: a labor shortage, knowledge of temporary help services, & a need to establish additional control over work. Continued use depends on firm size, cyclical variations, & the absence of a union. These propositions are examined through a case study of the American Telephone & Telegraph Corp (A1 & I). Findings show that even though A1 & I has all the necessary preconditions, the union constrains management's efforts to increase temporary use. The implications of the findings are discussed in the realm of the core-ring organization.

* Increased economic development is clearly associated with lower fertility levels among industrialized nations, however, among less-developed nations, level of development has not been able to adequately explain existing variations in fertility. Here, ordinary least-squares regression is used to test the hypothesis that economic structure is a significant predictor of fertility rates within a sample of less developed countries. In many developing countries the most productive sectors employ a relatively small proportion of the LF. This phenomena, economic disarticulation, is shown to be a significant predictor of fertility rates, holding constant the level of development & controlling for cultural & biological determinants of previous total fertility.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 21 pp.
- * An attempt is made to clarify the human rights debate & to show how one can discriminate among types of violations & devise indices for a genocide & human rights crisis alert system: a method to signal observers to try to stop the killings. To distinguish the rights that underlie gross violations, the concept of life integrity is developed, & an order among forms of its denial proposed, including: genocide, political killings, torture, planned starvation, detention without trial, slavery & forced labor, & arbitrary restriction of free movement & separation of families. To assess whether one can discriminate states perpetrating (or attempting) genocide or mass political killings from other states violating life integrity & constricting civil & political rights at the same time, 4 states in different regions committing genocide or political killings between 1975 & 1984 are compared with matched nonperpetrating states (paired by political, economic, & demographic attributes). Data on violations were derived for a 5-year period from a content analysis of contemporary reports by nongovernmental human rights organizations coded on Life Integrity Violation Analytic (LIVIA) forms. Discussion focuses on uses of torture, characteristics of perpetrators & victims, ideological dehumanization of victims, & how the ideology & aim of the governing elite is related to the target & limits of violation. Future uses of LIVIA analysis are suggested.

Feinson, Marjorie C., Hansell, Stephen, & Mechanic, David (Instit Health Care, Rutgers U., New Brunswick NJ 08903), HMO Interest among Medicare Beneficiaries

- * An assessment of HMO (health maintenance organization) awareness & interest levels among Medicare beneficiaries, identifying demographic, economic, & health status characteristics predictive of awareness & interest. A structured interview telephone survey was conducted during 1986 with a random sample of 314 beneficiaries aged 65+. Multivariate analyses revealed that greater awareness was associated with more education & having employment related medical insurance. In contrast, those interested in enrollment had greater burdens from out of pocket medical costs & lacked employment related medical insurance. An unanticipated finding was that health status measures were not associated with HMO awareness or interest. These findings suggest that HMOs may have a large, untapped market among relatively healthy Medicare beneficiaries. Thus, HMO policies might be redirected toward beneficiaries concerned about future medical care costs without necessarily increasing the proportion of high medical care utilizers.

Fenwick, Rudy (Dept Sociology U. Akron, OH 44325), The Political Reproduction of Class Relations: Provincial Development Policies and Income Inequality in Canada

- * Historical case studies & cross national research have shown that political factors (eg, democracy, level of welfare spending, strength of labor-oriented parties, & share of gross national product spent by government) affect the shape of economic distribution, ie, level of income inequality or shares of national income that go to various SCs. This work is expanded by examining the effects of variations in economic development policies between laissez faire & state managed in the level & bases of income inequality among three Canadian provinces: Alberta, Quebec, & Ontario. Alberta represents a more laissez faire approach to economic development, & Quebec a more activist, state managed approach. Ontario represents a middle of the road development policy, & is a control case because of overall higher levels of income & economic diversity. Results from historical, demographic, & survey data (drawn from a 1980 study of matched communities samples from each province) indicate that while the level of income inequality varies only slightly among the provinces, the bases of inequality vary substantially & are related to the direction of development policies. In Alberta, workers in the multinational sector & employer/owners benefit most; in Quebec, workers in the state sector, managerial & semi-autonomous classes, & union workers benefit; in Ontario, workers in the state, multinational, & domestic core sectors, along with professionals & employer/owners, benefit. Moreover, Quebec differs from the other provinces in that occupational skill differences are not related to income inequality while 'Marxist' SC categories are strongly related. The reasons for this anomaly between Quebec's activist development policy & its SC based inequality are discussed, as well as its implications for theories of how policy outputs affect SC relations.

Fine, Gary Alan (Dept Sociology U. Minnesota, Minneapolis, MN 55455), On the Macrofoundations of Microsociology: Meaning, Order, and Comparative Context

- * Just as Randall Collins argued that macrosociology has a microsociological foundation, so does microsociology have a macrofoundation. For all social theorists the key underlying issue is social organization: how do individuals form themselves into larger aggregations of persons that behave in a systematic, predictable, & effectual fashion. Microsociologists must emphasize how constraints of perception direct & channel social action. There exists "an obdurate reality of images" that involves the recognition of the physical limits of the built environment, the structuration of social order & the reality of power, institutional linkages, the obdurate reality of tradition, & mirrored beliefs of organizational primacy. An attempt is made to integrate these features into microsociology that depends for the generation of meaning on a comparison of social contexts.

These concepts are used to define four types of technological systems & identify the requisites for acquiring or developing each type. These observations are articulated with the literature on technology transfer & appropriate technology. Analysis.

The relevance of historical materialism for conceptualizing the implications of reproductive technologies is explored. By analogy with the concept of mode of production, the concept of mode of physical & social reproduction is defined as the set of relations between people mediated by relations to the material conditions of reproduction. Changes in the modes of reproduction (changes in biological conditions of physical reproduction) have triggered changes in the social relations of reproduction. Empirically & at the level of market & social relations between individuals, take the form of structural & functional differentiation between biological & social parenthood, & the transformation of biological relations into market relations. Depending on their relationship to the means of production & exchange, individuals become buyers or sellers of the biological element of reproduction. Here, an attempt is made to delineate the nature of the changes in the relations of physical & social reproduction, & explore their connections to patterns of property ownership & family SS. It is tentatively concluded that these changes, which affect a proportion of the population in advanced capitalist countries, signal the emergence of a purely social (ie, unrelated to biological ties) & individualistic concept of parenthood (ie, unrelated to the reproduction of the SC location of the kinship group).

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 39 pp.

It is argued that global patterns of inequality & uneven growth are related within developed countries as well as within underdeveloped countries. These intracore patterns, however, are often mediated by federal policy. Southern Ill. is used to illustrate the case of a peripheral region in a core country, based on US census data & statistical data from numerous state agencies for 1976-1986. It is suggested that the theoretical state concerning the concept of development has neglected to include an analysis of uneven development in core countries. The importance of federal policy as a mediating factor affecting that uneven development is underscored. As such, it is inappropriate to impose a world-system model on uneven national development. Instead, an analysis is proposed that includes both international & national relationships & processes.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

The existence of formal self-help organizations among immigrant groups is due, in part, to social factors such as country of origin links & solidarity-fostering discrimination in the host society. However, many new immigrant groups lack country of origin links & experience little residential or occupational discrimination in the host society. Using data from participant observation & in-depth interviews conducted 1982-1988, patterns of interaction & organization formation among Soviet Jews in Calif. are examined. While Soviet Jews interact on an informal basis, they create few formal organizations. Exceptions to this tendency are demonstrated by: (1) business persons & activists who get together on the basis of US experiences & needs, & (2) religious congregations & medical professionals who create organizations drawing on experiences, leaders, & practices transferred from the country of origin. Those organizations relying on country of origin links appear to be more stable. In conclusion, although scarce, country of origin links are important for the creation of formal organizations among this new immigrant population.

Gold, Steven J. & Eaton, Thelma L. (Dept Sociology Whittier Coll., CA 90608), Depicting Wellness: The Presentation of Self in a Stroke Rehabilitation Center.

Since stroke victims often suffer permanent disabilities, stroke rehabilitation must include nonmedical techniques for achieving wellness. Participant observation & photographic data are used to show how stroke victims learn to display a "well" self as they interact with other participants & staff in a rehabilitation center. The self-presentation style of stroke victims is recorded as they pose for portraits taken by a staff member of the center. These posed portraits are contrasted to "candid" shots. Analysis of the portraits reveals that regardless of the participants' age, sex, type of disability, relationship with the photographer, or appearance in candid photographs, styles of self-presentation are very similar. Results indicate that the stroke center's participants learn to project an institutionally defined & endorsed image of wellness.

Goldfarb, Jeffrey (New School Social Research, New York NY 10011), Bringing Culture Back In by Keeping It Out.

Six points are made regarding the sociology of culture: (1) The culture in the sociology of culture is best understood as the arts & sciences. (2) Culture is the arts & sciences, should not be viewed as a reflection of society, the mode of production, dominant morals or opinions, or anything else. (3) Culture should be strongly distinguished from mass culture & ideology. (4) The basis of the autonomous cultural development is conversational. It has to do with the development of often tendentious, sometimes deferential conversations that cultural agents in their works have with their predecessors & on conversations with contemporaries, not primarily defined by extracurricular concerns such as marketing or political ideology. (5) Since sociologists are embedded within cultural traditions & form a significant part of a culture public, as cultural agents they must make cultural evaluations. (6) Lastly, cultural works are overdetermined symbolically. They are open to multiple interpretations that must be mapped, respected, & evaluated. The multiple interpretations of culture & the politics of interpretation are the primary objects of investigation in the sociology of culture as the arts & sciences.

Goldstone, Jack A. (Northwestern U., Evanston IL 60208), Sociology and History: Producing Comparative History.

Comparative history is not a merger of sociology & history, but a distinct endeavor with its own methods & goals. It can make contributions to historical understanding, but these are hindered by current problems in social theory, & confusion between abstract "laws" & actual historically robust processes. Once these issues are seen to be mere distractions, comparative history can proceed with its task of causal explanation of why particular sequences of events actually occurred.

¶ It is suggested that the effects of high school tracking on student achievement are not constant across schools. Based on the work of Sørensen (1970), four structural dimensions of tracking systems are described: selectivity, electricity, inclusiveness, & scope. Two postulates, resting on available knowledge about the mechanisms through which track effects occur, lead to four hypotheses concerning the structure of tracking & its relation with achievement. The hypotheses are tested with data on math achievement from the nationally representative High School & Beyond Survey data. The results suggest that track effects are greater in schools that contain larger & more homogeneous Coll tracks & less between track mobility.

Canzboom, Harry B. G., Luyckx, Ruud & Treiman, Donald (State U. Utrecht, NL 3508 LC Netherlands), Intergenerational Class Mobility in Comparative Perspective.

¶ A preliminary discussion of an ongoing effort to assemble a comprehensive new set of intergenerational mobility tables for a large number of countries. A distinctive feature of the approach is that, insofar as data permit, multiple tables from each country are analyzed, hoping to overcome problems of measurement incompatibility that have plagued previous comparative mobility analyses. Using log multiplicative scaled association models that incorporate measures of the political & economic development of countries as exogenous variables, 136 intergenerational class mobility tables from 32 countries are analyzed, classified according to the six category classification of Erikson, Goldthorpe, & Portocararo (no reference provided). Utilizing multiple tables for countries allows testing of the hypothesis of systematic between country differences by estimating the between country variance in the relevant parameters, as well as assessing the change over time. The between country variance accounts for about half the total variance, indicating significant between country differences. Economic development affects mobility in two ways: (1) it reduces social distance, as measured by the size of the scaled association coefficient, & (2) it reduces the extent of class self-reproduction as measured by the size of a general diagonal effect coefficient. Contrary to expectations, socialism is not unequivocally associated with a society's openness, net of economic development.

¶ In the last decade the focus of environmental conflict has shifted from existing pollution problems to potential environmental problems (Gidwin, Thomas N., "Patterns of Environmental Conflict over Industrial Facilities in the United States, 1970-78," Natural Resources Journal, 1980, 20, Apr). Here, a case study of Exxon's attempt to develop a large underground zinc-copper mine next to the Sokaogon Chippewa reservation in Wisc is used to illustrate some of the characteristics of this new pattern of environmental conflict. The conflict is placed within the context of the recent entry of the largest oil companies into the mineral industry & the differential sociopolitical vulnerability of mining companies vs oil companies. The formulation of specific environmental issues went far beyond narrowly conceived impacts to encompass cultural survival, land use, SE effects, human health effects, & preventive & risk reduction measures. A variety of tactics are examined that were used by a grass-roots Indian environmentalist coalition, which forced Exxon's withdrawal from the project in Dec 1986.

The historical integration of Iran into the world system & its structural transformation into a semi-peripheral society are traced. This transformation constituted asymmetrical growth, a common feature of dependent development that often prompts resistance movements. Unlike previous movements of modern Iran, the Islamic revolution rejects full participation in the capitalist world economy. This & similar movements in the Middle East use tactical measures such as hostage taking that have not been recognized as resistance strategies. The Islamic revolution represents a unique strategy of dependency control that is anti-West, antidependency, & anti-world system participation.

Gerhardt, Uta (Dept Medical Sociology U Giessen, D-6300 Federal Republic Germany), The Sociology of Health/Medical Sociology in Western Germany.

¶ Medical sociology in West Germany entered the academic scene in the early 1970s. In the wake of the 1968 student criticism of medical care, 'psychosocial medicine' was instituted, of which medical sociology became a minor part. This origin proved an obstacle to medical sociology's awareness of its sociological heritage & its incorporation into academic sociology. Its reaction was to concentrate on topics competing with those of medical research & practice in their own realm: predominantly, what has been named social epidemiology, ie, investigation of social origins of disease (eg, heart disease, cancer, & psychiatric illness), & environmental influences of health, especially as related to self-help. The topic of organization of health care is still undervalued, investigated by only a few of West Germany's medical sociologists. A longstanding clandestine adherence to structural functionalism has finally yielded to theoretically less outdated viewpoints, but medical sociologists still refrain from indulging in what they might consider "too much sociology."

Gerhardt, Uta & Kirchgassler, Klaus-Uwe (Dept Medical Sociology U Giessen, D-6300 Federal Republic Germany), The (Sick) Body as "Locus of Control": Marital Interaction, Theories of Illness, and Imminent Role Reversal—A Case Study.

¶ In chronic illness, the patient's body is likely to become an important theme of marital interaction. Since controlling one's own body is a crucial aspect of personal autonomy as well as of social identity, switches in the locus of control where the wife takes over the control of the husband's body present important implications for familial coping with chronic illness. Here, one case from an ongoing qualitative study of patients (& their families) undergoing coronary artery bypass surgery is discussed based on interviews with the patient & his wife before & immediately after surgery. The recent onset of cardiac symptoms strengthened the position of the patient's wife in marital interaction, which was further enhanced by the patient's tendency to deny symptoms & use only pre-rational/nonmedical theories to explain his illness. Thus, the patient's wife becomes responsible not only for the patient's body, but also for accounting for his illness. Role reversal is also considered: the imminent retirement of the patient would make the wife the family's main breadwinner. The issue of how marital interaction is constituted as a reciprocal relationship if the balance of control in the marriage is skewed is addressed.

¶ The question of why educated black women were earlier in adopting multiple-role patterns than educated white women is addressed, based on a 1982 mailed survey of 2,902 alumnae (663 black, 2,131 white, 108 other) who graduated between 1934 & 1979 from a black, a Seven Sisters (private women's Colls), & a coeducational Coll in the US. Retrospective life histories were used to compare role patterns at age 35 & timing of events between ages 22 & 35. Black Coll Fs who entered adulthood in the 1940s were more likely to engage in postgraduate education quite early, participate continuously in the L.F., marry late, & have fewer children at a more advanced age than their white counterparts. Fewer black Fs were in clerical work or engaged in nondegree programs of continuing education. Role allocation based on racial segregation appears to account for the narrower range of occupations & somewhat higher attainments of the black Fs; they were primarily employed within the black community. In addition, they came from more modest SE circumstances, higher education & careers were their primary means to upward mobility. Younger cohorts of both races now seem to be converging on the simultaneous roles that were first adopted by black women & have since become the norm for women of both races.

The disciplines of sociology & brain science have a traditional relationship. Analogies & comparisons drawn from nineteenth-century philosophy as well as modern discussions of sociobiology—but little research has been done recently in either field with regard to how each discipline complements the other. Some findings in areas of sociological phenomenology & ethnomethodology show a remarkably direct resemblance to conclusions drawn by modern brain scientists. It was interesting to Alfred Schütz & other phenomenological writers that brain scientists such as Sigmund Freud were arriving at similar conclusions from their diverse primary points of view. Schutz's work (in Nathanson, M. [Ed.], Selected Papers: The Problem of Social Reality, Martinus Nijhoff, 1963) is set forth as a precedent for relating social phenomenology with the brain sciences. Turning to psychologist & brain scientist Michael Gazzaniga (The Social Brain, New York: Basic Books, 1985) & others, the work of these brain scientists is tied in with several ideas from sociological phenomenology, ethnomethodology, & Aaron Cicourel's analysis (Cognitive Sociology, New York: Free Press, 1974). Schutz noted that modern philosophers relating to the texture of the human mind, especially to the origin of abstraction & typification, converge with the output of neurological & psychopathological studies—the situation is one of enormous interest to the social scientist. Insights can still be derived from this convergence.

Human service delivery systems consist of networks of autonomous or autonomous organizations that are designed to provide services for citizens. In an evaluation of the effectiveness of 8 (4 Ur & 4 Ru) countywide Community Support Program (CSP) mental health delivery systems in the northwestern US, data were collected by face-to-face interviews with 364 Rs, 156 service organization directors, 49 case managers, 10 family members, & 82 seriously mentally ill clients. Four quantitative measures of effectiveness were used: comprehensiveness, coverage, service quality, & services coordination. Analysis of variance revealed that the 4 service system effectiveness measures differentiated the counties. As they are useful measures for assessing countywide service systems, 3 of 6 cases, the 4 effectiveness measures were positively intercorrelated, thereby confirming CSP claims that the key services form an integrated set & that it is feasible to provide a full range of services without reducing quality or hindering coordination. The measures differentiated stakeholder groups in suggestive ways, e.g., service providers identified the services as present than did service recipients. Finally, Ur counties differed significantly from Ru counties on all 4 effectiveness measures.

- Gwartney-Gibbs, Patricia A. & Hundley, Gregory S. (Dept Sociology U Oregon, Eugene 97403). Inequality in Workplace Jurisprudence: Sex Differences in Union Contract Coverage. The most promising lines of recent inquiry regarding gender inequality in employment concern internal labor market practices, such as hiring, assignment, & promotions. One intraorganizational process remains unexamined, however: workplace jurisprudence, referring to formal & informal rules used to resolve disputes & conflict in the workplace. The most systematic form of workplace jurisprudence is grievance procedures established by union-negotiated contracts, which endow employees with rights & provide a mechanism for voicing complaints & disputes. It is hypothesized that grievance procedures are less available to F than to M employees, due to their different structural positioning in industries & occupations. Union contract coverage models are estimated based on theories of union membership & sex stratification. Utilizing data from the May 1985 Current Population Survey, merged with industrial characteristics from the Censuses of Industries (1982) & occupational characteristics from the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, probit equations estimate individual union contract coverage as a function of a vector of personal, workplace, occupational, & geographical characteristics. Testing for the effects of sex & occupational sex segregation, & interactions of these with certain industrial characteristics, it is found that sex & occupational segregation play significant roles in explaining access to union contract coverage, & that sex & segregation interact significantly with certain industries & firm size. In conclusion, discussed is how sex inequality in access to union negotiated grievance procedures contributes to aggregate sex differences in job satisfaction, turnover, productivity, & earnings.

- Hajda, Jan (Dept Sociology Portland State U, OR 97207). Causes of Pluralization in Czechoslovakia, Poland, and China.

- Pluralization in a communist society implies the emergence of value autonomy, i.e., the creation or assertion of standards independent of Marxist-Leninist dogma; it means the emergence of organizational autonomy, which is the creation or resurrection of public associations independent of communist parties & their affiliated mass organizations. Such pluralization is generated by crises both similar to those occurring in the noncommunist world, & specific to the communist ruled orbit. Five kinds of crises that have occurred in communist societies are economic, moral, those related to status equality, ideological, & those concerned with ethnic relations. This proposition is examined in the cases of Czechoslovakia from Jan to Aug 1968, Poland from Aug 1980 to Dec 1981, & China in 1978/79. It is argued that some combination of the crises, not a single crisis, must occur for value & institutional autonomy to appear. This accounts for the fact that pluralization has not taken place in those communist societies that have faced only an economic crisis.

¶ A comparative "regime centered" analysis of post-WWII revolutionary movements in Vietnam, Malaya, the Philippines, & Indonesia is presented. Both the incidence & outcome of social-revolutionary national liberation movements are explained by the particular combination of Western political domination in each colony & the form of political rule during Japanese "interregnum" of WWII. The one successful social revolution in the region, in Vietnam, was the direct result of the politically exclusionary nature of direct French colonial rule together with Japan's decision not to sponsor a noncommunist nationalist leadership in Vietnam during WWII, but to allow the French to remain in power. By contrast, where Western colonial regimes or the Japanese allowed or even encouraged indigenous political leaders to participate in colonial government & decision making, especially regimes clearly moving toward local self rule, revolutionary movements were unable to seize power. Thus, the explanatory sufficiency of world systems & SC analyses of revolutionary movements in the Third World is questioned, & it is suggested that sociologists need to examine modes of political domination as well as modes of production in order to understand how & why revolutionary mobilization & the size of state power occur or do not occur in different contexts.

Gordon, Michael (Dept Sociology U Connecticut, Storrs 06268), The Family Environment of Sexual Abuse: A Comparison of Natal and Stepfather Abuse.

¶ Data from 17 states, drawn from the 1983 National Study on Child Neglect & Reporting, were used to compare families in which a daughter had been sexually abused by a natal father or stepfather. While broad comparisons were made in terms of age & race of victims, as well as household composition, the primary focus was on familial stress factors. Given the lower incidence of natal father abuse & the assumption that natal fathers have stronger emotional links to their children & greater commitment to the father role, it was predicted that when they did engage in sexual abuse it would be in a family environment characterized by relatively high levels of personal, social, & economic stress. This was confirmed to the extent that natal father abuser families showed significantly higher levels of drug &/or alcohol abuse, marital problems, & insufficient income than did stepfather abuser families.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 16 pp.
¶ Many feminists have argued that researchers must "give voice" to hitherto silenced women by adopting "the view from below" & emphasizing the active role of the Rs (called "participants") in the production of research. Critically reviewing the literature on feminist methodology, it is argued that this perspective, while absolutely essential, is not sufficient because the insistence on induction precludes generalizability, risks empiricism, impedes the creation of a cumulative body of knowledge, & may preclude a deeper understanding of the specific milieu being studied. Drawing on Nancy Hartsock's work ("The Feminist Standpoint: Developing the Ground for a Specifically Feminist Historical Materialism" in Harding, S., & Hintikka, M. B. (Eds), Discovering Reality, Dordrecht, the Netherlands: D. Reidel Publishing Co, 1983) & on critiques of racial & other biases in Marxist & feminist social science, the implications of the social biography of social scientists for both Marxist & feminist methodology are discussed. A more multifaceted standpoint is advanced that reflects the complexity of the diverse forms of oppression, furthering the development of theory while putting into practice the lessons of the various feminist methodological critiques.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.
¶ It is argued that Max Weber conflates a functional analysis of legitimation (the subsumption of norms & activities under a set of value commitments) with an analysis of particular structural form, traditional legitimation. In consequence, he misconstrues rational-legal authority as a form of legitimation instead of a form of justification (procedural process). In a similar fashion, Emile Durkheim's conflation of a functional analysis of moral solidarity with a structural analysis of a particular form, mechanical solidarity, leads him to argue as if there were a sum relation between moral solidarity & one structural form of org. contractual solidarity. The logic of the theories of moral & contractual solidarity in Weber & Durkheim are reconstructed in order to understand the relationship between legitimation & justification, & mechanical & organic solidarity in different stages of societal development.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 34 pp.
¶ That some are compelled to drop out of society has for ages aroused concern of the moral community & the inquiry of social thinkers. Among the social thinkers, Emile Durkheim set precedent by concluding that certain extreme forms of dropping out, suicides, should be correlated to individual idiosyncracies but to levels of societal regulation & integration, namely, to terms we have come to know as anomie & egoism. We suicides represent the extreme of dropping out, there are other means of social withdrawal, particularly drifting, which can also indicate the negative functioning of the "conscience collective." Here drifting as a form of dropping out is defined, & categories of anomie & egoistic drifters described. While the collective's influence on Durkheim's subjects ceases with their suicidal departures, this is not the case for those who simply depart the community in space. Drifters continue to carry the collective impact with them. As a result, a route is paved for addressing societal actions to those who have only spatially ended communal life: reverts that have ultimately tarred the drifter as a deviant.

Greenfeld, Liah (Dept Sociology Harvard U, Cambridge MA 02138), Nationalism as a Style of Thought.

¶ It has proved impossible to define nations & nationalism with reference to the presence of objective characteristics such as ethnic homogeneity, language, religion, or customs in general. Attempts to link nationalism & nation formation to, & represent them as expressions of, modernization—another set of objective characteristics—is equally unsuccessful. The historical analysis of the development of nationalism & national identity does not support the modernization argument. Based on a thorough examination & comparison of historical data pertaining to the development of nationalism & nations, nationalism is defined as a style of thought, a cultural ideological construction, a cognitive perspective that places the sources of individual & collective identity with people. It is argued that this perspective—via the construction of a specific identity—effects a thoroughgoing change of political culture & transforms the nature of politics, leading to the formation of nations. This argument is substantiated by examples of the process of emergence of nationalism & its effects in various societies.

England challenges the assumptions of separate work & emotional lives for men & women, & raises questions for the study of gender. The experience of Brigham Nims, as revealed in his diaries & letters, provides a vantage point from which to reassess assumptions about household Dofl & intimacy between friends & siblings. Three questions are addressed: (1) how the separation of spheres affected nineteenth century Ms' personal lives, (2) how the ideology of domesticity influenced them, & (3) whether there was a M 'world of love & ritual' that paralleled that of women. The results challenge several underlying assumptions: (A) that Ms & Fs lived their lives in completely separate spheres, (B) that Ms did not ignore the prescriptive adages of advice manuals & ministers, & (C) that only Fs engaged in special intimate friendships. If the separation of spheres was observed by individuals as rigidly as it was advocated in prescriptive literature, then it is unlikely that Brigham, in his M world would have sewed, cooked, ironed, & quilted with womenfolk. To glimpse into nineteenth century New England life through the experience of Brigham Nims poses intriguing questions for the study of gender & how cultural prescriptions affect individual lives.

* Data from approximately 4,000 Ms in the sophomore cohort of the High School & Beyond Survey are used to (1) describe Ms at risk of becoming teenage fathers, & (2) examine the causal process leading to early fathering. Bivariate results show that Ms at risk of young fatherhood have unique attitudes & family, school & dating experiences. In addition, their parents & peers have unique attitudes. Analyses suggest that factors causally affecting teenage fathering, being black, going steady, having unorthodox views about parenting outside of marriage have the strongest impact. Attaching little importance to the work ethic, having friends who put little value on education, having a mother with a low level of education, & coming from the South also increase chances of teenage fatherhood.

* An exploration of the emotional dynamics underlying the offering of romantic propositions, with the aim of uncovering the emotions leading to & resulting from, deceptive propositions, based on personal interview data (N = 14). For most people, asking for a date is an emotionally threatening experience, due to a common fear of rejection, which is interpreted as a personal rejection. Thus, the very act of asking someone out creates a potentially shaming experience, due to the threat of rejection. People often attempt to disguise shame through an emotionally deceptive invitation, ie, an invitation that hides the true emotions of the invitor. In such situations, the invitor deceives both him-herself & his/her potential partner. The result is a lack of emotional connectedness & eventual social disruption. Findings indicate the primacy of emotions in the invitation process & represent a first step toward including emotion as a component in romantic invitations.

Harrington, C. Lee & Bielby, Denise D. (Dept Sociology U California, Santa Barbara 93106). The Mythology of Modern Love: Representations of Romance in the 1980s.

* The changing ideal of love in the US is explored. According to theorists working in this area, love is both an experience marking the onset of adulthood & a mythical cultural ideal. It has been argued that the traditional notion of love as a union based on mutual self-sacrifice & devotion to the relationship is giving way to an emergent notion of love based primarily on individual growth. Emerging notions of love & commitment in popular culture are traced, as represented through the fictional medium of TV, in particular, daytime soap operas. The structure & dynamics of love relationships among central couples within them are examined. Evidence is found of utopian relationships, which realistically illustrate notions of modern love while refusing to relinquish the ideals of the traditional love myth. In conclusion, what has & has not changed in fictional representations is evaluated, & implications for contemporary gender roles are explored.

A theoretical framework is developed to analyze the persistence of the institution of work requirements & to explain the dismal record of current work programs. Integrating institutional & political economy perspectives on organizations, the analysis shows that, in response to the moral ambiguity of poverty, such work programs persist because they serve a symbolic function by affirming institutional rules about welfare & work. The actual characteristics & performance of such programs can be explained by economic & political variables operating in a context of symbolic & ambiguous work requirement policies.

* For the past decade, the post high school plans & aspirations of black & white seniors have been recorded annually in a large, national sample survey, Monitoring the Future, carried out by the Survey Research Center of the U of Michigan. Analysis of these data indicate that plans of black & white seniors have followed similar paths in time: there have been essentially no changes in trends among blacks or whites in plans to attend technical or vocational school or in plans or aspirations to complete a two year Coll program. Plans & aspirations to enter the armed forces have increased among blacks & whites, more so among blacks. Plans & aspirations to complete a four-year Coll program have grown among black & whites, though less so among blacks. There is little evidence of a change in values or motivation among black seniors that accounts for the decline in their chances of Coll entry. Patterns of entry into military service, changes in the labor market for recent high school graduates, & the availability of direct grants to support Coll attendance may help to account for decreases in chances of Coll entry among blacks.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 19 pp.

¶ Scholarship about history is deconstructed into four modes of discourse that typically figure in any historical research: discourse on values & interpretation, narrative discourse, historiographic explanation, & sociological explanation. By varying the combinative structure of these four models of discourse, it is possible to generate a logical typology of ideal typical strategies of research on history. Four strategies of comparative historical sociology include: universal history, theory application, contrast-oriented comparison, & a macroanalytic approach. A parallel set of strategies is identified for sociological history: situational history, specific development history, a historicist approach, & configurational history. While these eight formal possibilities do not exhaust the working relations of sociology & history, they offer epistemological reference points that may be used to clarify the methodological underpinnings of a diverse range of scholarly practice.

Hammond, Michael F. (U. Toronto, Ontario M5S 1A1). Affectivity and Structural Emergence: A New Theory of Micro-Macro Linkages.

¶ Individuals will manipulate their social worlds to try to construct as strong a pattern of nondistressful affective arousal as possible: affective maximization. Its pursuit results in unevenly distributed affective attachments patterned with hierarchical differentiation. Social differentiation & inequality can mimic & amplify this pattern, increasing for some the long-term likelihood of arousal. Due to a symmetry of form between the most likely individual arousal strategies & the shape of inequality, inequality can be an affectively arousing end in itself, or a means to such ends. For a population as a whole, its emergence is inevitable & scale sensitive. Different types of inequality require different levels of shared information & regular interaction to secure arousal, & also have different negative costs within a population. In small scale cultures, inequality that is high information & low cost, eg, prestige inequality, is more likely to persist than economic inequality, which has lower information requirements, but higher costs. However, if scale greatly increases & technologies are limited, eg, as in riverine agriculture, then low information but high cost inequality appears as emergent elites seek affective maximization. In areas on the boundaries of such riverine cultures, the costs of inequality eventually lead to the emergence of other-worldly differentiation, in which a future & better time beyond this world is a focus of affective weighting for entire groups. Finally, in areas even further removed from riverine cultures, the continuing costs of magnified inequality lead to the emergence of this-worldly temporally differentiated systems based on the continuous production of vast amounts of widely available material goods to serve as affective foci, making possible a partial reduction of economic inequality as a dominant framework for affective maximization. Thus, industrialism is marked by a third pattern of inequality: long-term nonrandom pattern of social evolution.

Hammond, Michael F. & Murray, Susan (U. Toronto, Ontario M5S 1A1). Affective Maximization: A New Theory in the Sociology of Emotions and Ideas.

¶ As individuals try to maximize nondistressful affective arousal, social creations take the form of embodied hierarchical differentiation extended over time, because this is the pattern most likely to secure arousal. Ideas can mimic this form & key into this deeply appealing physiological arousal. They can be hierarchically patterned & embodied in rituals & material representation, & they can offer security of arousal over time, either by promising unchanging fixity, or some temporal differentiation in which the future is better than the past. Affectively keyed ideas are sensitive to social scales that shape interaction rates & information exchange among individuals, & thereby shape the likely affective impact. At low social scale with high average interaction rates, dominant ideas are likely to have minimal material embodiment & to stress continuity over change. If scale increases, such as in riverine agriculture, material embodiment increases, such as through architecture & art, but core remains divine & nonmaterial. These ideas are tied to extensive equality stressing the role of the divine in fixing this social order, or less cycles of such systems. On the geographic fringes of such cultures, the negative costs of extensive inequality eventually stimulate the emergence of other-worldly ideas stressing for entire populations the promise of a new & better life in a future beyond this world. Finally, the failure of such temporally differentiated systems to resolve the problems of extensive inequality leads to the emergence of scientific ideas that can be hierarchically ordered, materially embodied at their very core, & constantly changing. Thus, there are two nonrandom master trends in evolution of hierarchically differentiated ideas: increasing material embodiment & increasing temporal differentiation.

¶ Rates of physical violence in black families from the First National Violence Survey, conducted in 1975, are compared with rates from 1985 replication. Both studies used nationally representative samples with 147 black families in the 1975 survey & 576 in the 1985 sample. The rate of severe violence toward black children was 48% higher in 1985 than a decade earlier. Severe violence toward husbands increased 4% while violence toward black wives declined by 43%. These changes, when compared to the changes previously reported in the overall sample, support the claim that the changing rates are actual changes in behavior rather than a function of methodological artifacts or increase in reluctance to report violence in families. Explanations for the increased rates of black children & black men & the reduced risk for black women are explored.

¶ The classroom life of immigrant Korean children in the US is analyzed & how classroom life affects their learning ability in school & their daily lives is examined in an attempt to understand the process by which the children interact with each other & interrelate in classroom activities. Empirical & participant observation data gathered in Los Angeles, CA classrooms on 164 immigrant Korean students in grades 7-9 suggest that these children suffer from conflicts between person-oriented & position-oriented authorities. These conflicts result in: (1) an ethnoclass assimilation orientation; (2) a wish for hedonistic & easy-going life styles; (3) extreme docility toward school authorities, & (4) a sense of inferiority toward white classmates. Several suggestions are made for US public schools dealing with immigrant children.

Fifteen independent variables, including social networks, age, sex, & health status, were hypothesized on theoretical & empirical grounds as predictors of mortality. Face-to-face structured interviews were conducted with the same Rs (N = 1,700, originally) in 1966/1974, & 1986/87. - An examination of how participants achieve social order in a work setting through the use of pronouns, involving a set of ideas & expectations concerning social rank. Social alignments shift over time in conversations according to immediate contingencies & yet related to major axes of distinction like gender, SC, etc. During fieldwork in the semiconductor industry, conducted over several months, conversations were recorded of a working team, including an engineer, technician, & workers who performed regular production tasks, & were examined via ethnographic & sociolinguistic analysis. Findings indicate that, in interactions, pronouns dovetailing with the action create social alignments within the local work setting. The engineer & operators make a somewhat dissimilar use of pronouns in discourse. Workers generally use "I" & "we" either for workers only or for the operators & engineer. They use the generic "you" for all other people. The engineer uses "we" frequently with varying points of reference, often as a substitute for "they" or "them" as well as the generic "you." Displaying the appropriate combination of authority & cooperation, the engineer says "we" on many occasions, though he is not going to perform the operations himself. Overall there are few instances in which either the engineer or operators alienate others, marking alignments with a straightforward "they."

- A social democratic corporatist theory of democratic interest representation is outlined & preliminary evidence provided. The following propositions are stressed: (1) Insofar as union confederations are strong (centralized, unitary, & representative of large majorities of LI participants), they will tend to pursue virtually public, as opposed to special, interests, & they will seek the collective gain of memberships so inclusive that they internalize negative externalities resulting from their actions (e.g. growth costs of redistributive benefits). (2) Insofar as their strength is complemented by leftist (social democratic, labor, & socialist parties) control of governments, they will tend to be able to pursue their policy goals, especially their governmental policy goals. In particular, societies only characterized by strong unions & leftist governments will tend to realize relatively high levels of income security, equality, stability, & growth. Furthermore, the realized outcome will tend to receive broad popular support & thus, advance the democratic representation of public economic interests. A review of relevant literature & some new empirical materials provides substantial support for the incipient theory of SC organizational capacities, interest aggregation, & capitalist democracy; theoretical & research agenda is suggested.

- An exploration of the sociological impact of the contemporary women's movement on women in occupations, focusing on the mechanisms, i.e., the class composition within any given occupation, the growth of the occupation in general, the growth in the F composition of the occupation, & the amount of unionization in the occupation that account for the emergence of women's occupational organizations, e.g., Sociologists for Women in Society. Logistic regression analysis confirms the hypothesis that, since the feminist movement has been primarily oriented toward middle-class women, women's occupational associations will be concentrated in white-collar occupations. The SC variable in particular demonstrates a high level of significance in predicting the existence of a women's occupational organization in any given field. Preliminary evidence is found for the possibility that the feminist movement had a socialization effect on women in the occupations by presenting women with collective purposes, strategies for action, & leadership that guide them in organizing women's occupational associations. The results have implications for research on how women organize to advance themselves in the workplace &, in general, on how women obtain power.

- A case study of the occupational adjustments of Laotian refugee women in the US, using a structural approach. The occupational distributions of the Laotians show a traditional sex-based Doff. "Men's work," for Laotians, involves skills & training, while "women's work" requires no training & is repetitive in nature. Consequently, men's work pays more money than women's work. As Laotian women increased their participation in the LI, they came to realize that providing maternal support for the family is a joint responsibility of men & women. Most Laotian women work in factories as well as take care of household chores, creating a duality of roles that causes stress & strain in the family. Cultural explanations used in analyzing the status of immigrant women in the US are criticized for failing to take into account the structural constraints that limit economic & social performance of immigrant women. Further research to compare the status of Laotian women with other immigrant women is recommended.

- An assessment of the variability in reader responses to a published short story, focusing on whether interpretations of this story are influenced by two sets of variables: traditional attributional variables, & reader statuses & personal experiences. Analyses of transcribed interviews with readers reveal substantial evidence of spontaneous trait attribution, but less evidence of spontaneous causal attribution. Causal attributions are consistent with predictions based on the covariational model of attribution, however, neither this covariational model nor a model of dispositional inference adequately characterizes the process of trait attribution. Striking evidence is also found of the f & complexity of interpersonal causal & trait attributions; in addition, reader characteristics have substantial influence on attributions. Variables that reflect the accumulation of life experience increase tendencies toward empathic readings in general, whereas individual values & attitudes are associated with differential patterns of empathy with story characters. It is concluded that attribu-ciologist is applying relativistic as opposed to nonrelativistic standards, (2) whether the analysis is objectivist or subjectivist in nature, (3) whether the analysis involves the contractual as opposed to the systemic nature of the social or moral order, & (4) whether value- or interest-based sociology is involved. Cross-classification of these four dimensions generates a sixteen cell property space of moral postures. An attempt is made to "map" various sociological approaches & convey a sense of the kind of empirical research that is logically entailed by the moral stance taken by the sociologist. It is argued, cp. that both Parsonian & Mertonian functionalism are objectivist, systemic, & relativistic, the difference between them being that while the former is value-based, the latter is interest-based. An argument that each of these functionalisms can take on a nonrelativistic form is put forward. Approaches that fit into more than one category of those that pose classificatory problems are also discussed.

Hayward, Mark D., Grady, William R. & McLaughlin, Steven D. (Health & Population Research Center Battelle, 4000 NE 41st St Seattle WA 98105), Recent Changes in Mortality and Labor Force Behavior among Older Americans: Consequences for Nonworking Life Expectancy

* Increment-decrement working life tables for 1977 & 1980 are used to assess the relative impact of recent changes in mortality & LF behavior on the number of years older men & women can expect to spend out of the LF (nonworking life expectancy). The life tables are based on data from the Current Population Surveys & pertain to the population aged 55+ for the 2 observation points. The results indicate that nonworking life expectancy increased dramatically between 1977 & 1980 for both men & women. Although LF behavior changed markedly for both population groups during the observation period, the results clearly identify that changes in mortality were responsible for the increases in nonworking life expectancy. Implications of the findings for social policy are briefly discussed.

Hegtvædt, Karen A. (Dept Sociology Emory U, Atlanta GA 30322), Approaching Interaction from a Justice Perspective: General and Unique Elements

* An examination of the uses & misuses of notions of justice in understanding social interaction. The formulation of equity theory in terms of its suitability as a general theory by Walster et al (1973) is analyzed & particularly its implication for social interaction. The limitations of these perspectives are discussed, along with more recent research endeavors regarding the emergence of justice concerns & their effects on social behavior. Several points are made about justice & interaction: (1) Regardless of whether justice concerns spur behavior or results from it, the role of justice depends on the perceptual & comparison processes of individuals, such component processes bolster the claim that justice is primarily an evaluative issue, & only secondarily a behavioral one. (2) Because evaluators may have difficulties separating their own personal concerns from those representing justice per se, justice evaluations may differ little from self-interested calculations. The moral connotation of justice in social interaction is considered, & it is concluded that to the extent that justice represents a unique aspect of social interaction, it cannot be a general theory of social behavior.

Heimer, Karen (Dept Sociology U Wisconsin, Madison 53706), A Dynamic Model of Reflected Appraisals, Peer Influence, and Marijuana Use

* A symbolic interactionist model of the peer processes leading to marijuana use among youth is developed & tested. It is argued that peers influence marijuana use through the role-taking process, whereby individuals take the perspective of their friends in evaluating themselves & anticipating consequences for their behavior. Specifically, it is hypothesized that reflected appraisals of self as one who gets into trouble & LF rules combine with situational peer pressures to determine the likelihood of subsequent marijuana use. To test this, a covariance structure model using the first three waves of the National Youth Survey is specified. Results show that reflected appraisals from friends influence subsequent marijuana use both directly & indirectly, through situational peer pressures, though magnitudes of these effects vary across gender. It is concluded that these results support the interactionist perspective & suggested that this perspective may add to the understanding of the mechanisms leading to other forms of deviance as well.

Henderson, Kathryn (Dept Sociology U California San Diego, La Jolla 92093), Some Problems Raised by Computer-Assisted Design: the Visual Practices of Industrial Design Engineering

* An examination of the visual communications that structure the process of designing an industrial engine package & consequent problem applying computer-aided design to that process, based on participant observation. Engineers employ both formal visual communications (computer drawn images) & informal ones (eg, rough sketches & hand-drafted drawings). In spite of the importance of the formal drawings, formal sketches, often not even drawn to scale, are used to get the done when official drawings are bogged down in computer grip. These design decisions are captured in the formal paperwork after rather than before the machine assembly. The computer-produced drawings come the formal memory for design projects & the interactive process of their generation disappears. Company attempts to formalize the design & production process, imposed on employee informal practices, led to communication breakdown. Engineers keep up the appearance that formal documentation has accomplished the task rationally & efficiently, while in practice informal visual communications get the job done. Thus, closer examination of engineers' visual practices also reveals a construction influenced by social interests & relations, as well as by social factors, eg, the power of informal visual communication traditions.

* While functionalists have emphasized uniformity across societies in social control of out-of-wedlock birth, conflict theorists have emphasized that repressive control is found at the intersection of social & sexual inequality. A cross-cultural measure of the repressiveness of control of marital birth is constructed ($N = 122$) & cross-tabulated with measures of social & sexual inequality from the Standard Cross-Cultural Sample. The repressive control of illegitimacy is significantly associated with paternal interest groups & complex social stratification systems, but with LF power. However, LF power interacts statistically with the other variables to produce repressive or relaxed control of illegitimate birth.

Herring, Cedric O. (Dept Sociology Texas A&M U, College Station 77843), Monitoring the Monitors: The Study of Racially-Based Changes in Political Alienation

* In discussing the role of the American Sociological Assoc's Minorities Fellowship Program in increasing the presence of minorities in sociology, the effects of researcher characteristics on the interpretation & characterization of research findings is touched on. As an example of research potentially influenced by the background of the investigator, discussion about the nature & sources of racial differences in political alienation is considered, & three competing views are summarized: (1) political culture & socialization theories, (2) spirit of the times theories, & (3) political structure & interest group theories. The results are directly contrary to political culture & socialization theory expectations that levels of political alienation would remain constant net of changes in the makeup of the population. Indeed, for each of the indicators, there were dramatic increases in political alienation for both blacks & nonblacks. It is clear that these trends in alienation did not reflect only large-scale historical events (eg, wars, scandals, assassinations), which spirit of the times proponents believe influence all members of the society in a similar fashion. Findings suggest that changes in political alienation were not differentiated & reflective of issues & events that were divisive & salient; they provide support for political structure & interest group theories, they also indicate that focus should be on the impact of government policies, decisions, & actions that affect racial groups differentially. It was concluded that (minority) scholars need to maintain a healthy skepticism concerning research about minority populations.

adequacy of the theory is tested by comparing the resulting model output with successive time-series data. Using the same model, alternative hypotheses may be tested in simulated experiments by systematically varying the initial conditions. This procedure is illustrated on a theory of union violations. Seven different data sets, one of which is presented in detail, were successfully reproduced by the model, demonstrating the strategy's feasibility. Two examples of simulated experiments are also given. Recurrent methodological objections that have been raised to the proposed strategy are considered.

Contemporary stratification theory emphasizes the role of work organizations in reproducing inequality, defining SCs, & shaping worker consciousness. Here, the effect of organizational job power (supervisory authority, decision making authority, conceptual autonomy) on the leftist beliefs of US workers is examined. The results provide only partial support for the theoretical expectations, with supervisory authority having the greatest impact of the three measures of job power. When the sample is divided along manual-nonmanual lines, the results are not consistent with the argument that manual workers are politically fragmented by differential levels of job power. However, these differences have some effect on nonmanual employees. Age, race, & sex differences are generally stronger & more statistically significant predictors of leftist beliefs than the job power measures.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 41 pp.

Migration to high natural amenity areas presents a special opportunity to compare the relative importance of motivations to move for economic & quality of life (QoL) reasons. Here, such migration to the Gallatin Valley of Mont. is discussed, using data drawn from personal interviews conducted with recent immigrants beginning in 1981 & continuing annually until 1986. The most salient characteristic of the migration is that it is short-lived, despite initial intentions of permanent residence. 80% of residents move within 10 years. While QoL attractions are more important for drawing migrants to the area, economic factors account for more outmigration. Nevertheless, most low-income persons stay for QoL reasons while many high-income persons leave despite economic security. It is concluded that both QoL & economic factors are important & subject to revision among such "spin-around" migrants.

A second thesis proposes a conceptual synthesis of subjectivist & objectivist explanatory strategies in the theory of new social movements, the latter understood as part of a general theory of modernization & social change. The last three theses suggest an agenda for the comparative analysis of new social movements, indicating some crucial variables that help explain the courses of concrete mobilization cycles, & illustrating their usefulness by providing some preliminary applications.

Despite the central importance of sampling, the adequacy of different sampling frames & the consequences of faulty sampling procedures are rarely considered in organizational research. Here, evaluated is the adequacy of five organizational sampling frames that are generally available to researchers in a wide variety of locations & that have been used previously in studies of organizations: direct enumeration, unemployment insurance (ES202) forms, Dun & Bradstreet's Market Identifier (DMI) files, the telephone White Pages, & Chamber of Commerce membership directories. It is argued that present-day sociologized Marxist SC analysis (in particular the work of Erik Ohn Wright) is totally at odds with a Marxist practice of the labor process. Rather than Wright grounding SC analysis within the concrete activity of a SC's self-objectification, including his own, he instead abstracts from this necessary ground & presupposes both a non-Marxist liberalist view of agency & a special theory of the labor process for SC analysts. The implications these differing practices of the labor process have for practices of objectivity, knowledge production, scientific activity, & revolutionary practice are explored & some of the elements that should ground an alternative practice of SC analysis are offered. Marxist SC analysis, far from confining its practice within present-day sociologized Marxism, must revolutionize the very terms of that debate. This transformation must implicate SC analysis as both textual & noncontextual objectification.

Social psychological & PO research investigating gender generally focuses on sex roles & sex role attitudes. While such research makes an important contribution to the understanding of women's roles, it cannot provide a complete picture because its assumptions & methods obscure the exploitative nature of gender relations. It is argued that the application of the concept of group consciousness to women is a more promising approach in that the reality of domination & subordination in gender relations is captured. Here, the theoretical underpinnings of both the sex-role attitude literature & the group consciousness perspective are reviewed, & the methods & findings of the two approaches compared. Conclusions regarding the relative merit of the application of group consciousness to understanding gender relations are presented.

† Addressing action is defined as the process in which an actor verbalizes an interactant's name, title, position, etc. to identify the addressee & initiate communication. It is sociologically meaningful as a ritual in which the relationship between interactants may be suggested; also, the addressing ritual can be viewed as an indicator of the normative structure of a particular society & hence may provide a criterion to compare societies. Here, addressing behaviors in Chinese & US society are compared using Ferdinand Tönnies's structural typology of Gemeinschaft and Gesellschaft (Community and Society, Tönnies, Charles P. [Ed.], see SA 11/595240) as a theoretical perspective. Based on personal observations in the two cultures, linguistic analysis & secondary data, it is proposed that the higher degree of social differentiation & social mobility in a society, the more relaxed, inconsistent, & cynical the addressing ritual tends to be.

† A research strategy is outlined, using computer simulation to empirically verify macrosociological theories & experiment with genuinely comparable study conditions. First the verbal statement of theory is transformed into a mathematical model, which is then simulated for a given set of social conditions & run on a computer. The obtained from each source is also computed. Focus is on the various public assistance programs (Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Supplemental Social Security, unemployment insurance, Medicaid, etc.) & the % of each household type receiving income from each particular source. The data are from Wave 5 of the 1984 Panel of the Survey of Income & Program Participation (SIPP). In the context of the conservative argument that public assistance fosters dependency among women & the radical critique that these programs provide very little to poor families, these data show that 1-headed households receive less income than married couple households, with black Fs receiving the least. Poor households are distinguished by poverty line income for half the time period covered (4 months). With this definition, only about 60% of poor households headed by white women receive public assistance vs 63% of poor households headed by black women. Their total incomes leave the white households at 63% of their poverty line & black households at 58% of their poverty line.

* Post-WWII South Korea is a key case for development theory. Its exceptional performance in industrialization is based on a combination of an active, directly intervening state & huge local conglomerates (chaebol), a combination that challenges both traditional theories of economic development & more recent theories of dependent development. The nature & extent of the state-chaebol relationship are examined over time, focusing on economic policies of the state that have dealt principally with the chaebol from the 1960s to the present: the Illicit Wealth Accumulation Charges in the 1960s; Development of the Heavy & Chemical Industry in the 1970s; & the Fair Trade & Monopoly Act & Reorganization of the Heavy & Chemical Industry in the 1980s. It is concluded that the state-chaebol relationship has changed from an antagonistic one dominated by the state in the 1960s to a friendly & interdependent one in the 1970s to an interdependent one, but with the state losing its upper hand in the 1980s.

* WWII was a critical turning point for US labor, deflecting depression era radicalism into postwar conservatism. In explaining the war's deradicalizing impact on labor, social historians have focused on two related developments: (1) the changing & increasingly conservative composition of the wartime U.L., & (2) the self-destructive policy of class collaboration pursued by many left-wing trade unionists. These explanations are critically examined through a deviant case analysis of the International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union, one of the country's most radical unions & the only one to survive the Cold War intact. It is argued that in this particular industry, wartime changes in employment & union policy were not uniformly conservatizing. Drawing on archival material, union & government documents, & interviews with many key participants, the wartime experience of rank-&-file longshoremen is reconstructed, & it is shown how the drift toward conservatism was held in check by a combination of selective occupational recruitment, political socialization, & continued union militancy during the war.

* Data derived from unstructured interviews conducted with theater, opera, & concert subscribers are used to describe the beginnings of the subscribers' interest in the arts, & to provide a psychological analogue of Pierre Bourdieu's structural theory of cultural reproduction. The accounts also provide an extension of Bourdieu's theory: some people trace the origins of their interest in the arts to their "inheritance" of cultural capital; others to their possession of "talent", while for others, the acquiring of an interest in the arts seems to depend on "hard work". In all cases, however, interest in the arts is related to the acquisition of specific competencies & skills as well as the development of an aesthetic attitude. The concepts of "hard work," "talent," & "inheritance" of cultural capital are explored with reference to the way the arts are construed in relation to SC. * Most Western industrialized countries have experienced a moderate to sharp decline in mortality &, to a lesser extent, incidence of coronary heart disease (CHD). This favorable trend, though, does not seem to apply equally to all subgroups of the population: data from the US, GB, & the Federal Republic of Germany indicate that SC differences in CHD mortality have increased rather than decreased. The same SE differential seems to exist regarding the distribution of risk factors for CHD, eg, smoking, exercise, & dietary habits. If these trends remain stable, the shift from Mc to Fc morbidity will cause considerable changes in the population at which rehabilitation measures for CHD are directed. Here, data from ongoing research on coronary artery bypass surgery rehabilitation as well as published data on cardiac rehabilitation in general are presented, focusing on whether the current rehabilitation programs in the Federal Republic of Germany meet the needs of a growing blue-collar population with CHD. Data suggest that cardiac rehabilitation within the national health care system is Mc oriented & has not yet developed secondary prevention programs that are likely to reach the population at highest risk.

Klein, Lloyd (Dept Sociology Brooklyn Coll, NY 11210). Out on a Limb: Reassessing the Political Economic Consequences of the Consumer Revolution.

* The consequences of 19 Oct 1987 (Black Monday) still reverberate throughout the economy. It is argued that consumer & business credit operations laid the foundation for this collapse. James O'Connor's analysis of a coming accumulation crisis is integrated with a reconceptualization of the core/periphery elements of the financial industry. Focus is on: (1) the relationship of consumer credit with the larger business institutions, (2) factors explaining the impact of the credit industry; & (3) problems within the credit industry & those created by the consumer revolution.

A sociology of desire is proposed on the basis that desire is socially produced at the point where sexual difference is institutionalized in a binary hierarchical system of gender stratification. Three aspects of the social production of desire are analyzed: (1) desire as enforceable social fact based on Sigmund Freud's theory of the masculinity of libido; (2) desire as a methodical social practice (based on Rosalind Coward's discussion of femininity & the gaze [e.g., see Female Desire: Women's Sexuality Today, London: Granada, 1984]); & (3) desire as a system of exchange & communication (based on Claude Lévi-Strauss's analysis of kinship structures & social bonds [e.g., see SA 133/65B5918]). A framework is developed for studying how desire is produced at the intersection of sexual difference, gender stratification, & language. The processes by which men & women are compelled to assume their proper place in patriarchal systems of desire are also examined.

Kariya, Takehiko & Rosenbaum, James F. (Dept. Sociology, Northwestern U., Evanston IL 60208). Selection Criteria in the High School-to-Work Transition: Results from the High School and Beyond Surveys in the US and Japan.

The influence of grades, noncognitive behaviors, & father's occupational status on youths' occupational attainments in the US & Japan are mined. Interviews with Japanese teachers & employers indicate that, like both groups feel constrained to stress grades, both also feel reluctant to make it the main criterion, & they maintain that other factors also have an influence. Multivariate analyses of High School & Beyond longitudinal surveys in the US & Japan find that, contrary to stated values in the US, grades rarely affect youths' jobs, while grades have large effects on jobs in Japan, despite the reservations of Japanese teachers & employers. Moreover, contrary to contentions by Bowles & Gintis, noncognitive behaviors have few influences on jobs in either country. The implications of this system for youths' incentives, counselors' advice, & their experiences in the transition from high school to work are discussed.

Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp. The roots of Soviet Marxism's constraints on political democracy are traced in the derivation of the concept of proletariat as the subject of history. Two dimensions of this concept are analyzed: the location of the subject of history (class for itself) solely within the confines of the labor class, & the neglect of the third person (or Third World) within the tract model of the economy. Soviet Marxism's fetishization of labor is the process through which the human species transforms itself into a species being fails to consider art, revolution, & communication as domains within which human beings transform themselves. Moreover, Soviet Marxism's understanding of the labor process does not include the em's continual incorporation of noncapitalist production into the domain of wage-labor. The economic theory of Rosa Luxemburg is reconstructed in order to explore an alternative reading of Karl Marx. An attempt is made to develop a theory of history within which the human species might qualitatively transform the material conditions of existence, establishing the primacy of the reality principle over the pleasure principle.

An examination of tokenism in the Finnish workplace, using data obtained in a questionnaire survey of trade union members (N = 370 Fs & Ms) from 5 occupational groups in southern Finland. The occupations were selected on the basis of their sex ratio & SES: the F-dominated occupations included dentistry, nursing, & nursery school teaching; the M-dominated occupations included architecture, engineering, police work, & the technical fields. Masculinity/assertiveness & femininity/empathy were examined using the short version of the androgyny (Bem Sex-Role Inventory). The data on engineers & nursery school teachers were obtained through personal interviews. Tokens, in their workplaces, performed the same sort of work as persons of the opposite sex & most of their job-related daily contacts were with members of the opposite sex. Analysis defined two types of tokens: innovators, whose sex-orientation was either androgynous or cross-sex-typed, & solos, whose sex-role orientation was either undifferentiated or sex-typed. Innovators found their work more challenging, & were more satisfied with their work than solos. Though innovators experienced sexual harassment as often as solos, solos were more often treated in gender-stereotypic, discouraging, &/or patronizing ways than innovators. It is suggested that F solos, in M-dominated work settings, are encapsulated in a traditional F role, whereas their more assertive counterparts deal with unwanted sexual attention via a strong career commitment.

An analysis of employment by race, ethnicity, & gender in the economies of Calif., NY, & Ill. (all having large minority populations), using an industrial sectorization approach that categorizes industries into core vs. periphery. The two industrial sectors are distinguished by measures such as level of capital, labor intensity, concentration by firm, government intervention, foreign involvement, union organization, & growth. The data are from the 1980 census 5% Public Use Microdata sample (N = 1,186,232 for Calif., 878,133 for NY, & 572,703 for Ill.), with focus on whites, blacks, Hispanics, Japanese, Chinese, Filipinos, & Korean Americans. Among the factors examined are the high level of employment of white men as managers & professionals, domination of union organized ranks by both white & nonwhite U.S.-born men, continuing gender segregation of both white & nonwhite women in the clerical ranks, & concentration of foreign-born men & women of color in low wage blue collar occupations.

Kaye, Howard L. (Dept. Sociology Franklin & Marshall Coll., Lancaster PA 17601). Rationalization as Sublimation in the Theories of Weber and Freud.

In spite of Max Weber's verstehende methodology, which seeks to explain social phenomena by clarifying the inner motivation & subjective meaning of these phenomena for the acting individuals, Weber's psychological analysis of the rationalization & intellectualization of the contemporary world is relatively weak. For this reason, a Weber-Sigmund Freud dialogue would seem to be a matter of great theoretical interest in any analysis of rationalized culture. Yet such such dialogues have been rare, & in the case of Talcott Parsons's account, marred by insufficient attention paid to the actual theoretical positions of both Weber & Freud. A point of contact between both theorists' accounts of rationalization is identified in their respective understandings of "sublimation" for both Weber & Freud; the rationalizations of culture are to be understood in their inner psychological aspects, as a process of sublimation.

Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 33 pp.

An overview of the ecumenical movement, & an attempt to identify the five central sources of ecumenism: Christian mythic structure, Christian theology, social ethics, modern secular pluralism, & administrative rationality. Fluctuations in ecumenism are attributed to the varying historical context of each element. It is suggested that some of the sources of ecumenism that became vital in the early twentieth century (administrative rationality & social pluralism) are no longer vital factors in ecumenism, while others (social ethics) lead to internal disputes. The remaining sources of ecumenism (Christian mythic structures & theological convergence) are socially weaker but ensure that ecumenism will remain part of the necessary utopianism of Christianity. Also discussed are the emergent terms "reception" & "process" that ecumenists employ to retain the plausibility of the notion of religious solidarity that animates ecumenism.

portunity (ie, transplantation) among persons disabled by chronic kidney failure. Although SES differences enter into the age, race, & gender selection processes described, these differences only partially explain transplantation selection processes. The kidney failure population provides an interesting context for this analysis because entitlement to Medicare coverage of dialysis & transplant therapies in the US largely eliminates the effect of differential "ability to pay" for services in this disability group.

* The power of synthesis as a methodology is in its ability to look at the same issue across independent sources, & in its systematic integration of secondary information. It can fill a current need in the social sciences to integrate, assess, & utilize research findings, & can help clarify future research topics, methods, standards, & reporting techniques. Different definitions & forms of syntheses are discussed, including purposes & sources of data. A prospective evaluation synthesis is described in the example of state catastrophic illness programs. Five states have had such programs, & administrative information from the programs as well as interview data from state program officials provided the basic information for the synthesis. A framework to compare the programs included items such as eligibility, cost sharing mechanisms, & costs. High costs associated with hospital benefits were a challenge to all the programs. RI is the only state that currently provides hospital benefits, & it has the unique culture of interfacing private insurance with individual cost saving incentives.

* An examination of the impact of historic changes in the US industrial structure on the marriage behavior of farm sons. Data from the 1880-1900 National Panel Study are used to analyze migration & occupational placement as mechanisms through which the structure of local opportunities potentially affected family formation. The findings suggest that growing opportunities for farm ownership channelled farm sons into non-farming, farm labor, & nonfarm occupations. These alternatives, in turn, reduced marriage chances during the early adult years. In contrast, intercounty migration between childhood & young adulthood increased the likelihood of marriage. Overall, the analysis demonstrates our linkages between opportunity, occupational fortunes, migration, & equality.

* The leadership (N = 3,542, response rate 59%) of the 76 most important organizations in the field of education policy in the US, GB, & the Federal Republic of Germany completed a mail questionnaire that focused on current issues, eg, maintenance of discipline in the classroom, ability streaming, the influence of various actors, the aims of education, & the role of national vs local governments. Exploratory & confirmatory actor-analytic techniques are used to measure the extent to which the underlying issues debated in each country were similar. Common themes identified include: market vs state, factors dealing with broad vs narrow goals, pro- vs antitraditional values, & the major actors: teachers, parents, & governmental authorities above the level of the school. Cluster analysis & correlations between organizations show that comparable organizations (eg, left-of-center parties in each nation) took up similar positions on these common underlying issues.

* Etching has always been considered a minor art & most of its practitioners minor artists. Looking at the period (roughly 1880 to 1930) when etching was à la mode, it is noted that women found it easier to enter than many other arts but were at a disadvantage relative to their M peers when it came to achieving a lasting reputation. Three processes that lead to a permanent place in the collective memory are differentiated: (1) the generation of material, (2) getting it noticed & recognized, & (3) assuring its entry into the archives, through which the work & information about its creator become accessible. Using data on a matched sample of F & M etchers, the effect of demographic factors, career contingencies, networks, & the historical climate on the amount of "commemorative activity" are examined. It is suggested that the historical climate may be considered the mediating variable that does much to put women at a disadvantage.

Langman, Lauren & Harold, Wanda (Loyola U, Chicago IL 60611), Affect: The Missing Dimension of Capitalist Reproduction.

* People seem to act, think, & value in ways typical of their society. Anthony Giddens suggests that it is in the myriad of everyday trivia that people reproduce themselves & their society. This raises two questions for the Marxist tradition, why do people act to reproduce their own domination, for social psychology, what is the motivation for these actions? The Frankfurt school attempted to integrate Freudian social psychology & dialectical critique, but there are problems with the outmoded Freudian theory of motivation. Recent insights from sociological studies of emotion, informed by research psychology, suggest that considerations of affect can salvage the insights of psychoanalysis & then understand social reproduction as an affective process. This approach sees that fear, satisfaction, & anger are inborn affective responses that become socially conditioned. In the privatized family of late capital, these affects are manipulated to foster the internalization of character. Everyday life, work, play, & the associated interactions become socially regulated by characterologically located desires for satisfaction & fears of psychic harm. This approach offers new insights into social reproduction via narcissism, consumerism, & politics as amusement as intertwined moments of late capital.

Using a set of more than 60 academic labor markets defined by discipline, the effect of each of these labor market attributes on the degree of wage variation observed is examined, holding constant differences in labor market composition. Evidence is found that these labor market dimensions do help explain the extent to which there are different amounts of salary variation in different contexts.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

* An examination of the effects of short-term temperature fluctuations on mortality in the US from 1921 to 1985, using monthly data on mortality from the Vital Statistics & on temperature from the National Oceanic & Atmospheric Administration & the US Dept of Agriculture Weather Bureau to analyze the seasonal pattern & lag structure. Also addressed is whether the link between mortality & temperature weakened during the period considered, & whether it varied by state of residence. Six states: Mass, Mich, Wash, Utah, NC, & Miss were selected for analysis because they form a representative sample of the various geographic & climatic regions in the US. Subsequently, annual deaths by age from the Vital Statistics were analyzed to determine whether mortality of specific age groups is especially responsive to temperature fluctuations. The analysis was carried out using distributed lag models, parameters were estimated by ordinary least squares regression, & serial autocorrelation of the residuals was corrected for by a second order autoregression. Results clearly show that extreme temperatures are linked to increases in mortality, especially among infants & the elderly. Furthermore, the strongest relationship is found in the poorer areas of the residence, suggesting that public health programs (eg, financial aid to improve housing, heating, & clothing) might help in reducing the lethal effects of unusually cold winter & hot summer temperatures.

¶ The relationship between environmental concern & economic well-being is tested by tracking, from 1982 to 1988, the rate of public attitudes toward environmental protection in a "free enterprise" city that experienced sudden & profound reversals in its economic fortunes. The prolonged recession that gripped the Houston (Tex) area beginning in mid-1982 is clearly reflected in survey data showing increased economic concerns & plummeting evaluations of job opportunities. The evident slowing of economic growth, rather than engendering an increased willingness to trade off environmental protection for accelerated jobs production, has been accompanied instead by a consistently strong & pervasive commitment to environmental quality. The data suggest that environmental protection is coming to be widely viewed not only as an important public good in its own right, but also as an essential ingredient in any effective strategy for economic recovery in the changed economic environment of the 1990s.

¶ On 11 Mar 1986, the Georgia State Board of Pardons & Paroles issued a posthumous pardon to Leo Frank, who almost seventy years prior had been convicted in an Atlanta trial for the murder of a girl aged 13. The case was marked by one of the most blatant displays of anti-Semitism in US history. Here, data obtained from the files of the Anti-Defamation League, interviews with people involved in the pardon application, & a review of the relevant literature are used to examine why the pardon came when it did, the role of the changed image of the Jew relative to SS & power, whether such a travesty of justice involving a Jew could occur today, & the impact of the pardon on Jewish/Christian relations. In 1913, the forces of bigotry were on the offensive; today, though some of these forces are still at work, they are clearly on the defensive. Equity & fairness are now dominant; the media, the pardon board, Christian & Jewish leaders, & all of the political institutions have forcefully come out on the side of justice for Leo Frank.

¶ Examined is how the adoption of microcomputers is changing patterns of employment, occupational distribution, & sex segregation for women in the information sector. Occupational data from the Current Population Survey for the years 1974-1986 are recoded into four sectors (information, noninformation services, manufacturing, & farm) & compared to data on the adoption of microcomputers from Standard & Poor's Industry Surveys. It is found that the growth of FLEF participation has depended heavily on the growth of the information sector, & computerization has not slowed that growth. Employment of women has actually increased with computerization, in spite of the fact that the traditionally M-dominated occupational groups are the ones increasing. There has been a shift in occupational distribution with computerization, & women have benefited, as their gains in management jobs have more than offset slowed clerical growth. Sex segregation, as measured by the dissimilarity index, has declined more sharply with computerization, as the change occupational mix magnifies the effect of ongoing integration.

In contrast to social scientists, management researchers pay scant attention to differential gender effects of microcomputer development. ● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 14 p.

¶ A discussion of the issue of equity for women in academic sociology based on a comparison of the status of women ($N = 230$) in 25 highly ranked sociology departments with that in a national sample of departments. Results indicate that top-ranked departments exert a marked numeric influence on the profession: they account for a disproportionately large share of the nation's graduate students & faculty members, & produce 50% of the doctoral students who ultimately take up faculty positions in graduate departments of sociology. Although women on top-ranked faculties occupy proportionally fewer positions than in departments nationally, these women are more likely to have tenured positions at advanced academic ranks. Gaps in rank & in tenure between men & women are also narrower in top-ranked departments. Similarly, there are proportionally fewer women graduate students in top-ranked than in national departments, though the former are more likely to have financial assistance. Current hiring practices in both top-ranked & national departments appear sufficient only to maintain women's current proportional representation, but faculty vacancies are quite disproportionate due to the departure of Ms. In a situation of slow or no growth in the size of most faculties, this trend will result in a small increase over time in the fraction of faculty positions occupied by women.

Kurzweil, Edith (Dept Sociology Rutgers U., Newark NJ 07102). The Development and Influence of Feminist Psychoanalysis.

¶ US feminists, & the sociologists among them, have been slow in exploring psychoanalytic theory for their ends, however, beginning with Kate Horney in the 1920s, a number of women psychoanalysts have elaborated on Sigmund Freud's theories in protest of the repression of women. Freud, who incorporated some of their findings, particularly in his New Introductory Lectures (1933), debated with them about the origins of femininity. These debates were renewed in France & less so, in Germany in the 1960s. Here, focus is on these later debates, which address specific issues of interest to both women & men, & which were linked to the locus of psychoanalysis within the population at large. It is argued that psychoanalytic feminism in the US sparked by international contacts within the women's liberation movement—inadvertently brought radical, psychoanalytic thinking into academic establishments, & finally into sociology.

Lewin-Epstein, Noah (Dept Sociology & Anthropology Tel Aviv U, 69978 Israel). Labor Market Position and Antagonism toward Arabs in Israel.

● An examination of antagonism toward Arabs in Israel within the structural-behavioral framework, focusing on the relationship between labor market position & resource competition, & antagonistic attitudes of individuals. It is hypothesized that Jewish incumbents of labor market sectors that employ large numbers of Arabs are likely to feel threatened & will espouse more hostile & exclusionary attitudes. It is further hypothesized that these processes may account for the higher antagonism toward Arabs found among Asian/African Jews. The analysis utilizes recent survey data of the Jewish population, collected as part of the "Israeli-Arab Conflict" project. The findings indicate that labor market position correlated to individuals' attitudes toward Arabs, however, this factor does not explain the different dispositions of Asian/African & European American Jews. The constructs of ethnicity & labor market position are suggested as two dimensions of a model that addresses antagonism in a power-competition perspective.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

● It is argued that spatial context must be considered in a network analysis framework, because too voluntaristic an emphasis risks ignoring the city that social worlds are at least partially constrained by their environments. One such environment is the residential community. By examining the strength of the connection between characteristics of networks & characteristics of their spatial communities, the extent to which context exercises constraint over voluntaristic network formation is gauged. Specifically, the link between network racial heterogeneity & residential neighborhood racial heterogeneity is examined using data from the 1986 Southern California Social Survey, a telephone-administered survey of 1010 Los Angeles area residents. None of the demographic, attitudinal, & network structure variables considered predict network racial homogeneity more strongly than does neighborhood homogeneity. It is concluded that composition of the spatial community has at least a small to moderate constraining influence on what network analysis considers the voluntaristically formed personal network.

● Birth certificate data are used to determine long-term trends in the first names given to children born in Calif during this century. Changes in the stability of the first names given to children are measured, including shifts in the rapidity of name turnover, concentration of names, & gender differences. Periods of particularly sharp disruption in naming patterns are identified to see if they are influenced by major social upheavals, eg, WWI, WWII, the Depression, the Viet Nam protest period, & the feminist movement. Differences between subareas of the state, long-term trends in the linguistic characteristics of the names, & shifts in other parts of the nation are considered, & the role of mass media in popularizing first names is noted.

Liebertson, Stanley & Bell, Eleanor O. (Dept Sociology Harvard U, Cambridge MA 02138). Children's First Names: An Empirical Study of Social Taste.

● It is assumed that changes in the names given to children represent the combined influence of shifts in the imagery associated with each name, the notions parents have about the future characteristics of their children, estimates of the response of others to the name, public awareness of names through the mass media, & parents' beliefs about what are appropriate children's names for persons of their status. The study of children's first names provides an opportunity to infer the effect of various social characteristics on these aesthetic processes. To accomplish this end, using data from all birth records in upstate NY between 1973 & 1985, the influence (both individually & jointly) of two major social characteristics—education & race—on the names chosen by parents is analyzed. The following questions are addressed: if there are educational & race differences in the aesthetics of children's names, if the gulf between black & white naming practices is largely a reflection of educational differences, if name changes tend to be introduced in some subsets of the population at an earlier period than in other subsets, & the direction & nature of the changes made.

Lindenfeld, Frank (Dept Sociology & Social Welfare Bloomsburg U, PA 17815). Economic Development and Political Democracy.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

● World Bank data for the 1980s were used to analyze the connection between economic development, economic equality, & political democracy among countries in Latin America, Europe, North America, & Oceania. Five indicators of development were examined & combined into an overall index: gross national product per capita, % of the LF in agriculture, per capita energy consumption, enrollment in secondary schools, & LF population as a % of 2 population. On the basis of Seymour Martin Lipset's division of countries into more vs less democratic (Political Man: The Social Bases of Politics [see SA 8 2/607522-23]), it was found that almost all countries with a high index of development are also more democratic than those with a low index. The exceptions are socialist East Germany & Cuba, which scored relatively high on development. No clear relationship was found between a relatively narrow gap between rich & poor & the existence of democratic political institutions. Possibly what is most essential for democracy is the existence of a large Me, though this hypothesis was not tested. The connection between development & political forms seems to be of a contingent nature. There may be some threshold of economic & social development below which political democracy cannot easily be sustained. Above that threshold, a country may or may not develop democratic political institutions depending on historical circumstances, one of which is the strength of Western political movements for democracy.

Link, Bruce G., Cullen, Francis R., Struening, Elmer, Shrout, Patrick E., & Dohrenwend, Bruce P. (100 Haven Ave Apt 201, New York NY 10032). A Modified Labeling Theory Approach to Mental Disorders: An Empirical Assessment.

● Critics of labeling theory have made strong statements about its utility. They not only have disputed Scheff's (1966) provocative etiological hypothesis, but also have downplayed the importance of factors such as stigma & stereotyping. By contrast, modified labeling perspective is proposed that claims that even if labeling does not directly produce mental disorder per se, it can lead to an array of negative outcomes. At its core this extension of the labeling approach asserts that socialization leads individuals to develop a conception of how most people treat mental patients. Upon entry into treatment, this set of beliefs takes on new meaning for patients. The more they believe that they will be devalued & discriminated against, the more they feel threatened by interaction with others. They may keep treatment a secret, try to educate others about their situation, or withdraw from social contacts they perceive as potentially rejecting. This, in turn, can lead to untoward consequences in such areas as social support networks, jobs, & self-esteem. This modified labeling perspective is tested, using samples of patients (N = 164) & community residents (N = 429). It is found that both patients & untreated community residents believe that mental patients will be rejected by "most people." Additionally, patients endorse strategies of secrecy, withdrawal, & education to cope with the threat they perceive. Finally, the social support networks of patients are affected by the extent to which they fear rejection from others & by the kinds of coping responses they employ as a means of dealing with their stigmatized status.

Laumann, Edward O., Tam, Hong-wing & Heinz, John P. (Dept Sociology U. Chicago, IL 60637). The Social Organization of Party Politics, Ideological Orientations, and Elite Linkages within the Washington Representative Establishment during the First Reagan Administration: A Network Analysis.

¶ Based on interviews with 63 top elite members of the Washington, DC representative establishment active in 4 national policy domains (agriculture, energy, health, & labor) during the first Reagan administration, an attempt is made to specify the principles that generated the informal instrumental network among these elite members. Various descriptive techniques & loglinear models are employed to identify the structural features of the network as well as the underlying logic of sociometric choices. Elite members within the same policy areas were, as expected, much more likely to form instrumental ties. In addition, economic ideology significantly predicted the formation of instrumental ties within & across policy areas. The tendency to inbreed, moreover, was somewhat stronger among economic liberals than among conservatives. Surprisingly, shared party preference & other background characteristics of the elite did not significantly predict the presence of instrumental ties. A tentative interpretation is offered of the prominence of economic ideology in shaping the instrumental network.

¶ An examination of the communication behavior & elaboration of appropriate information by work group members confronted with uncertainty in decision making situations, with focus on the interactive dimension. The theoretical aim of the research is (1) to identify the forms of endogenous knowledge based on judgments of appropriateness negotiated by members involved in this process, & (2) to study the relationship between the process of elaborating information & the structure of the work group. Work groups are defined structurally in terms of authority relationships, taking into account different attitudes toward authority. A qualitative methodology, building on a sociometric approach, is used to compare communication networks in two different types of organized work groups: a social service unit & a civil service department. The process of elaborating information is reconstituted by confronting actors with a series of tasks & problems dealing with the internal boundaries of the groups.

¶ An analysis & critique of the pernicious postulates of the new & increasingly influential manifestations of utilitarianism. It is argued that utilitarian theories suffer from serious internal problems & are unsatisfactory when applied to substantive problems of SC, solidarity, & religion. Although important, their contribution to the solution of specifically sociological problems is severely limited. It is concluded that it is not rational to choose neoutilitarianism as the dominant theoretical strategy. Suggestions for alternative ways to satisfy substantive sociological interests are proffered.

¶ An examination of the extent to which a discreditable condition, a chronic facial pain disorder (Temporomandibular Pain & Dysfunction Syndrome (TMPDS)) is felt to be stigmatizing by those who suffer from it, focusing on the consequences of feeling stigmatized for social relationships. Analysis of scale data obtained from a sample of TMPD drawn from a private practice reveals that a large majority feel & not understood because of their facial pain. A substantial also believe that others attribute their condition to personality. Many facial pain patients endorse two common stigma management strategies: education of others & secrecy. Multiple regression shows that the networks of social supporters of alienated patients relatively more members of their household than do network alienated patients. A relationship is also established between & dissatisfaction with intimate relationships. It is concluded identification of distinctive dimensions of a particular stigmatization confirms the relevance of more general sociological about stigma processes.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service | $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper.

¶ An examination of how part time professional women in M- occupations who are deemed objectively marginal in fact & marginally subjectively. Extensive, semistructured personal conducted in 1985/86 with a strategic sample of 30 Fs, all married, residing in the Washington, DC, area sought in about the Rs' work & family experiences. Most Rs perceived to experience marginality as part time professionals, fewer themselves to be socially marginal as part time homemakers, but of full time homemaker role accomplishment ideals were still in expectations many held for themselves. Most perceiving the be marginal described only negative consequences of this experiential evidence, based primarily on cross tabulations of extent of marginality with other major variables (family & career satisfaction levels, interrole strains, & coping behaviors) & on personality trait self-reports & measures indicates that the concept may have potential as a discriminating variable but conceptualization & measurement need refinement. Suggests further toward this end.

Lescue-Long, Mary Ann & Kronenfeld, Jennie J. (Dept H Administration School Public Health U South Carolina, C 29208). Allied Health Fields and Professionalization: Is There Movement toward the Professional Model?

¶ The existence of a true process of professionalization is questioned presenting two models of what constitutes a profession & by the professionalization efforts of two allied health occupations dance with the models. The first model is normative in nature, highlights those aspects of an occupation that give it legitimate claim to profession. The second model is empirical & incorporates son's notion of the political nature of the autonomy possessed by professions. Professionalization is defined as movement toward a professional model. A review of the professionalization process pursued health occupations indicates, not movement toward one of the professional models, but toward a contrived model of occupational professionalization, which moves toward the establishment of a profession but lacks a legitimate claim to the title profession & is dedicated fulfillment of occupational desires for autonomy & prestige. Hence, this third model, the model of contrived occupational professionalization, casts doubt on the idea that an occupation can transform into a profession.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 17 pp.

* The sociological dimensions of Chinese & Indian immigrant groups in Northern Ireland are mapped, using middleman minority theory as an analytic framework. Data were gathered through fieldwork, documentary research, & limited unstructured interviewing. Both groups are found to be demographically small & dispersed, & almost entirely concentrated in the petite bourgeoisie. Despite classic middleman economic features, only a moderate degree of ethnic cohesiveness is evident among the Indians & almost none among the Chinese. Moreover, a strongly negative host society response has not developed. This is attributed mainly to the lack of a status gap between indigenous Protestant & Catholic ethnic communities as well as their high degree of institutional completeness. The experience of Asians in Northern Ireland suggests that, in societies with competitive rather than colonial or caste-like ethnic relations, the classification of groups as middleman minorities is meaningful only in terms of their general economic position & function rather than a unique mediating role in the ethnic status system. It also demonstrates that outsider ethnic groups occupying specialized, limited economic positions can function without evoking a hostile host society response as long as they are not perceived as economic or demographic threats to dominant or subordinate groups.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

* Traditional & feminist perspectives are integrated into a more comprehensive theory of power. Three systems of social action, each having characteristic types of power relations, are postulated: (1) exchange, a market-like order that emphasizes quid-pro-quo transactions; (2) pooling, an order that emphasizes the collectivity; & (3) placing, a complex feudal-like order that emphasizes ascriptive characteristics that determine social relationships such as those between white master & black slave, older teacher & younger student, & husband & wife. Within this three-part framework, many resources that have traditionally been specified as the bases of power, eg. knowledge, can also be seen as the bases of powerlessness, depending on social context & the definition of those possessing the resource. Also, entitlements & rights can be viewed as forms of power possessed by individuals & groups usually considered powerless; coercive & generative power become forms most commonly found, respectively, in exchange & pooling.

Marini, Margaret Mooney & Singer, Burton (Dept Sociology U Minnesota, Minneapolis 55455), Causality in the Social Sciences.

* Despite the recognized importance of identifying causes, relatively little attention has been devoted by social scientists to considering what causality actually means & how knowledge of causes is acquired. Both ontological & epistemological aspects of the problem of causality in the social sciences are considered. Examining philosophical thinking on the ontological question, several questions are posed: what is causality, what are causal relationships, are such relationships real, what is the nature of causal laws, & what can be a cause. The purpose is to arrive at a more precise understanding that can inform attempts at operationalization.

Turning to the epistemological, or methodological, problem of causality, the acquisition of causal knowledge is considered: how one learns about causal relationships, & how causal claims & hypotheses are tested. The process of causal inference is examined, discussing the criteria on which causal inferences are based & operational strategies for building a body of evidence to support such inferences.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

* A theory of group solidarity is developed that spans the macrosociological work of Emile Durkheim, Talcott Parsons, & Michael Hechter, & the microsociological work of Tomatsu Shibutani, Leon Festinger, & Ronald Feldman. The theory identifies three fundamental properties of solidarity groups: (1) members strongly identify with the group, (2) members attach strong positive emotions to the group, & (3) members perceive others in the group as meeting these same conditions. Group solidarity, defined as such, is traced to several causal conditions: structural concordance of individual & group characteristics, the exclusivity of person-group exchanges, interpersonal affective ties between members of the group, degree that group sanctions are positive (rewards), rather than negative (punishments), & the interpersonal communication of identification with, & emotional attachment to, the group. The consequences of group solidarity include both effects on individual behavior (eg. more willingness to engage in self-sacrificing behavior) & the production of emergent phenomena (eg. a group culture, social control institutions).

* The definition of a social problem is the central concern in the sociology of social problems as it has been developed from the perspective of social constructionism. In this light, the salient concerns of social definition & problematic conditions are integrated in a research orientation proposed for the development of an applied sociology of social problems. The orientation is illustrated by a discussion of a policy oriented study of the homeless in Santa Cruz, Calif. that was fundamentally concerned with the prevailing transient definition of the inhabitants of the streets. On the basis of an empirical examination of the street inhabitants, these individuals are redefined as streetpeople, with significant implications for policy development. The prospects of an applied sociology of social problems are discussed.

* Six dimensions are identified (ideology, goals, practices, membership composition, auspice/chapter/funding, & scale) along which feminist organizations can be compared to assess their qualities & their resemblance to organizations that are not feminist. It is wondered if feminist organizations comprise a new species of organization & if so, what genus the species falls into. Research is called for that: (1) compares feminist organizations with each other dimensionally (rather than globally only); (2) is longitudinal (so process & evolution can be studied); (3) compiles a census of feminist organizations (current & over time); (4) focuses on feminist organizations' failures & successes, & (5) compares feminist organizations with nonfeminist organizations to isolate defining qualities. Scholars, & activists, are cautioned to avoid judging feminist organizations against an idealized standard that may be impossible to sustain over time.

Forber, Judith (Sociology Dept Graduate School & U. Center City U. New York, NY 10036), Can the Medical Profession Ever Be a Company of Equals?

¶ Based on examination of the role of F. MDs in U.S. medicine in the 1980s & 1990s, it is argued that the bureaucratization of medical practice & the increasing control of medical decisions by the government & other third-party payers will not impact equally on all members of the medical profession. As in the past, while all MDs may have equal (albeit lesser) authority over & responsibility for their patients' treatment, MDs will continue to be unequal in their control over medical resources & priorities. Without their own colleague networks & hospitals, F. MDs will not attain positions of power in local medical communities, although they may have more input on a national policy-making level. It is suggested that, as in other professions, there is a "glass ceiling" on F. MDs' upward mobility, so that they rarely hold top-level positions. Stratification within a profession allows all holders of certification to work, thus, their training is not wasted, nor can the profession be accused of open discrimination. The policy-making positions of great authority, however, are still held by members of the socially dominant group, & it is their values & priorities that prevail.

Lorence, Jon (Sociology Dept U. Houston, TX 77004), Growth in Service Sector Employment and MSA Gender Earnings Inequality: 1970-1980.

¶ Panel analyses of 1970 & 1980 U.S. Census data from the largest 124 MSAs reveal that increasing employment in service industries reduces the gender gap in median earnings net of changes in human capital & community variables. Although the finding that service sector growth reduces the earnings of both men & women supports the thesis that deindustrialization is economically detrimental to both sexes, men's earnings deteriorate at a faster rate than women's earnings, resulting in more similar earnings between the sexes. Expanding employment in service industries influences the gender earnings gap by modifying the MSA occupational structure. The findings imply that men in metropolitan labor markets experiencing greater employment in service industries suffer lower earnings because of dwindling high-wage blue-collar jobs. A larger MSA service sector component also reduces occupational sex segregation, thus helping to equalize the earnings of men & women.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 19 pp.

¶ National survey data are used to assess the influence of birth cohort, gender, & time on gender attitudes for 1,761 US adults born between 1932 & 1967. Between 1977 & 1985, both sexes & all cohorts came to endorse more individualistic, less domestic roles for women. Attitude change among women was twice that of men. These changes were relatively distinct for attitudes toward women, since adults (especially men) during the same time period labeled themselves more politically conservative. Results contradict predictions of a reemphasis on domestic roles but are consistent with the postulated effects of societal modernization on change in gender roles. Results also indicate that adult attitudes change over time & need not become more conservative as individuals age.

Lubeck, Sally & Garrett, Patricia (Bush Instit U. North Carolina, Chapel Hill 27599), Modeling Alternatives for Child Care.

¶ A conceptual model is presented that reflects the implicit goals & potential consequences of policies to support various forms of child care in the U.S. An exploration of the recent past & the current situation serves as a basis for delineating alternative strategies for the future care & education of the young. US Census data (1958, 1977, 1982, 1984) are used to examine how the child care arrangements of working women have changed over time. Analysis indicates that family-based care (by parents, older siblings, & extended kin), though decreasing, still predominates. It is argued that policy initiatives will move in either of two directions: increased support for & integration of work & child care responsibilities, or support of extrafamilial childrearing in homes, centers, & schools. Different types of care & policies that support them are viewed: (1) parental care through family benefit policies, (2) family-based care, (3) employer-supported care, (4) center-based care, & (5) school-based care.

¶ It is argued that the biomedical model predominating in social gerontological research on Alzheimer's disease & other dementing illnesses has resulted in little consideration of social forces that affect both disease progression & interpretation of disease processes. A mainstream sociological analysis of dementia is proposed, which addresses these issues: (1) a critique of the deterministic "stage theory" of dementia, (2) an examination of opportunity structures that affect the behavior of people with dementia, & (3) an investigation of the experience of dementia from the perspective of the demented person. This paradigmatic shift requires methodological shift from survey research to direct observation in the social world of the demented.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 17 pp.

¶ Neo-Marxists have recently acknowledged long-standing criticisms of Karl Marx's labor theory of value as at best a cumbersome & redundant price-model, but continue to variously defend the theory as an interpretation of historically observed class conflict between exploiters & exploited. It is argued here that value theory also fails badly as a "labor theory of exploitation." The fundamental flaw is the canonical premise that labor alone is productive, with normative implications closer to the entrepreneurial work ethic than to socialist standards of distributive justice. An alternative theory of exploitation is identified that is implied by Marx's earlier writings on alienation but obscured by his later association of exploitation with productivity. Contrary to the value-based formulation, here labor is exploited because capital is productive. What capital appropriates is not "surplus value" produced by labor, but the capacity to produce it. This alternative theory is then compared to that developed by John Roemer in A General Theory of Exploitation and Class (Cambridge: Harvard U Press, 1982).

Mestrovic, Stjepan G. (Dept Behavioral Sciences Lander Coll, Greenwood SC 29646). Durkheim, Schopenhauer and the Relationship between Goals and Means: Reversing the Assumptions in the Parsonian Theory of Rational Action.

* Durkheimian scholars have approached Emile Durkheim's thought primarily from the starting point that he was a positivist of sorts. Here the starting point is Andre Lalande's remark (in "Allocution in Centenaire de la naissance d'Emile Durkheim" [The Hundredth Anniversary of Emile Durkheim's Birth] Paris: Annales de l'Universite de Paris, 1960) that Durkheim was so enamored with Arthur Schopenhauer's philosophy that his students nicknamed him "Schopen." Schopenhauer's influence on Durkheim & some other precursors of the social sciences especially Georg Simmel, Wilhelm Wundt, Sigmund Freud, Ludwig Wittgenstein, Theodore Ribot, & Ferdinand Tonnies is traced. This new starting point in comprehending Durkheim's thought is then applied to Talcott Parsons's & Robert K. Merton's goals-means schema. It is demonstrated that, contrary to Parsons & Merton, Durkheim, like Schopenhauer, assumes that the "will" is a "striving without aim or end." Implications for reading Durkheim, in particular, his concept of anomie, are discussed.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 64 pp.
* Using Allan Bloom's thesis in The Closing of the American Mind (1987) as a starting point, the hiatus between Laurence Kohlberg's Kantian vs Emile Durkheim's Schopenhauerian philosophical assumptions is focused on relative to their systems of morality. It is argued that, contrary to many depictions of his thought as positivistic, Durkheim actually used Arthur Schopenhauer's philosophy as a starting point for his moral theory, much along the lines of Janik's & Toulmin's argument regarding Ludwig Wittgenstein in Wittgenstein's Vienna (1973). This is illustrated with regard to Durkheim's doctrine of homo duplex & its resemblance to Schopenhauer's argument in The World as Will and Idea (1818). Conversely, Kohlberg's moral development theory is related to Immanuel Kant's philosophy, which Schopenhauer & Durkheim both criticized. Durkheim & Kohlberg are further compared & contrasted with regard to the notions of individualism & justice in these philosophical contexts. It is concluded that Durkheim's thought does allow for post-conventional morality, in a Schopenhauerian context, that does not suffer from the drawbacks of Kant's system.

Mickelson, Roslyn A. & Ray, Carol A. (Dept Sociology U North Carolina, Charlotte 28223). Corporate Leaders and Secondary School Reform.

* The dismay expressed by business leaders about the lack of qualified young employees is currently echoed throughout the US. There is said to be a mismatch between the needs of employers & the capabilities of high school graduates. The problem is the opposite of that observed by social scientists, who argue that the lack of correspondence appears as one between overeducation & underemployment, as discussed by Heydebrand & Burris (1984) & others. The questions that these issues raise are examined. Why, at this particular moment in history, are corporate leaders efficiently concerned to enter the educational policy-making arena again? What kinds of capabilities & attitudes do they say they want? Why do employers demand a better qualified high school graduate when the majority of available jobs, particularly in the expanding service sector, require little in terms of either manual or mental skills? Do business leaders misunderstand the problem, ie, do they call for better educated workers because they cannot articulate their need for better disciplined workers? What are the structural factors contributing to the alleged problems? A case study is presented that explores these questions by examining how a large, growing southeastern city's business, civic, & educational leadership approach the perceived misfit between education & jobs in their community, based on observation & interview data (N not given).

* Child fosterage, the intentional giving up of natural children, is a relatively new topic in demographic studies & has come up mainly with regard to Africa, where the practice is traditional & widespread. In the West, the primary assumption is that children live with their parents in either nuclear or extended families. Notions of families should be constantly reevaluated, however, & with the development of linked own-children census samples, a study of practices such as fosterage becomes possible, moving outside traditional institutional or community investigations & into the wider experience of the national population. Such a study was conducted, based on an extraordinary resource of the public use sample developed by the Population Studies Center of the U of Pennsylvania from the 1910 census manuscripts. In this sample, children have been linked to their mothers within households, in a database of 360,000+ individual records. The sample was made to work out own-children analysis of fertility, so links were maximized & executed with great care, but the sample also provides a rich resource for examining the situations of children not living with their mothers. Statistical analysis provides evidence that child fosterage was a significant family strategy early in the twentieth century. Descriptive results provide indicators for age of independence, reveal significantly different racial & ethnic family practices, & demonstrate the impact of Ru-Ur migration on the family. The results also aid understanding of regional & economic differences, effects of education & immigration, & the widespread & persistent nature of child fosterage in the US.

Miller, Gale (Dept Social & Cultural Sciences Marquette U, Milwaukee WI 53233). Social Problems Work as Rhetoric.

* A neo-Durkheimian approach to social problems work is developed & applied. The approach is an extension of Douglas's analysis of institutional categorization & thinking, treating such processes as centered on the enactment & application of collective representations. They are rhetorically enacted & applied through the efforts of social problems workers (SPWs) to persuade others to act in preferred ways & defer to SPWs' claims to professional authority. The analysis is developed by considering the practical conditions associated with SPWs' efforts to persuade others & the social organization of their rhetorical expressions. SPWs' rhetorics are partly analyzed by reference to Toulmin's approach to arguments, focusing on how claims are expressed as conclusions derived from facts. The assumptions made by persons in formulating & expressing conclusions are also considered. Toulmin's approach is applied to aspects of SPWs' relations with others & extended by considering how SPWs rhetorically elaborate their arguments in response to challenges expressed by others. In conclusion, the implications of the approach for analyzing SPWs' relations with others & their rhetorics are considered.

Milner, Murray, Jr. (Dept Sociology U Virginia, Charlottesville 22903). Toward a Theory of Status and Sacral Relationships: The Case of Worship.

* Sacredness & status have been two key concepts of classical sociological theory, but their interrelationship has seldom been discussed. It is argued that sacredness is a special form of status. This conceptualization allows the use of common theoretical concepts & propositions to explain both status & sacral relationships. Key propositions relevant to the explanation of interpersonal status relations are outlined, the utility of this approach is illustrated via an analysis of the key elements of Christian & Hindu worship drawing on the propositions used to explain interpersonal relationships. This approach is also useful for the analysis of alternative forms of soteriology. The approach offers prospects of a general integrated theory of status & sacral relationships.

der-role ideology are all hypothesized to affect child care ideals. The data show that most women view parental care as ideal at all preschool ages; almost 40% take this stance even when the mother works only 20 hours a week. The strongest correlates of preferring parental care are living with a husband or M partner & espousing a traditional gender role ideology. The father currently providing care for his preschoolers, employment status, religiosity, & race are other important correlates. Education & income have no relationship to preferring parental care. The results are interpreted to mean that child care ideals are part of a broader family/gender ideology that is unrelated to SES, but related to current family situation.

¶ Observers have noted that disciplined study effort by U students is less evident in Japan, despite diligence after gaining employment (eg Vogel, Ezra, Japan as Number One 1979). To explore whether higher education is less demanding in Japan than in the U.S., interviews were conducted with 45 Japanese students with higher education experience in both countries, now residing in a New England community. Preliminary findings indicate that undergraduate students spend 31 hours weekly on study in the U.S., compared to 15 hours in Japan. About 80% of the Rs said that they study harder in the U.S. By & large, the demands on undergraduate students seem greater in the U.S.

McCutcheon, Allan L. (U Delaware, Newark 19711), Racial Differences in Survey Validity?

¶ Results of a latent class analysis of the 1982 General Social Survey Rs' disposition toward surveys & interviewers' evaluations of Rs' comprehension of the survey questions indicate a tripartite classification. Among those who are positively disposed toward surveys, "ideal" Rs are evaluated as having high comprehension, & "believers" as having low comprehension. "Skeptics" are negatively disposed toward surveys. Although blacks are more likely than whites to be classified as "believers," a hierarchical analysis of interviewers' & R race & education indicates that interviewers with higher education are substantially less likely than those with lesser education to evaluate blacks as having good comprehension of survey questions. These findings are discussed in light of their implications for differential survey validity for blacks & whites.

¶ For those concerned with issues of social justice & the distribution of rights, the abortion debate should be evaluated from a conflict of rights perspective: mothers' vs fetuses' rights, & women's vs men's rights. After examining the premises on which the definition of each of these conflicts is based, data from a national survey are used to explore the merits of the conflict of rights formulation. Evidence of lack of support for fetus personhood renders the mother-fetus conflict invalid. Findings concerning gender conflict suggest that group self interest might be associated with position in the abortion debate; however, religiosity & education emerge as the major predictors of opinion on abortion.

McGuire, Patrick (U Toledo, OH 43606), Socially Embedded Industry: Human Agency in the Development, Diffusion, and Institutionalization of the Early Electric Utility Industry.

¶ Attempting to specify Mark S. Granovetter's theory of socially embedded economic relationships, the history of Samuel Insull, Chicago (Ill) Edison (electric company), & the early electric utility industry is examined. It is shown that Insull's position as a bridge among networks of British financiers, British technical associates, equipment producers, & members of Chicago's "growth machine" enabled the prototypical development of Chicago Edison. Further examination indicates that Insull (as industry leader) used a similar constellation of formal & informal networks to minimize potential constrictions & to maximize developmental opportunities. The formal institutional relationships within firms & industries, & between industries & their environment, appear to arise from identifiable personal & interpersonal relationships & social networks. Thus, focusing on these social networks within historical context can help explain the basis of formal institutional arrangements at the firm & subsequently, the industry level.

McIlwee, Judith S. & Robinson, J. Gregg (Division Social & Political Sciences U Texas, San Antonio 78285), Women in Engineering: Promise Unfulfilled?

¶ The occupational status, experiences, & attitudes of F & M engineers were compared by means of fixed-choice questionnaires & open-ended interviews. Rs were selected from the 1976-1985 graduates of 2 major in southern Calif. Both quantitative (chi square, Pearson's r) & qualitative analyses were performed. While Ms & Fs were virtually identical educational qualifications & time on the job, & quite similar in occupational attitudes, Fs were significantly less likely to be holding high status design jobs & to be moving into engineering management. It is argued that these patterns can best be explained by a conflict model that emphasizes the importance of structural resources in the workplace & in the family. Interactional resources also play a role, especially self-confidence regarding technical ability, & the ability to engage in "self-promotion" on the job.

McMichael, Philip (Dept Sociology U Georgia, Athens 30602), Formulating Comparativism from a Non-Positivist World-Historical Perspective: A Fourth Research Strategy in Historical Sociology.

¶ In addition to the three research strategies in historical sociology delineated by Theda Skocpol, a fourth strategy is outlined. It is a historical method, subordinating comparative analysis to theoretically conceived historical questions. Instead of proceeding with an external, abstract unit of comparative analysis (nation/world-system), this method challenges positivist conceptions of social change by suggesting a route to substantive social categories internal to historical inquiry. While the fourth strategy has its lineages in Karl Marx's historical method (often misread through positivist eyes), it emerges in contemporary sociology via a double critique. World system theory has revealed the limits of the nation-state as the unit of much comparative analysis through its critique of the modernization paradigm. However, substitution of the world system as an alternative unit of comparative analysis commits a similar abstraction at a broader level. These collective limits are worked through with illustration from comparative-historical works, to an alternative strategy: historical inquiry that seeks to resolve the tensions between generalizing theory & historicism.

Messeri, Peter A. (School Public Health Columbia U, New York NY 10032), Structural Contingency Theory and the Prevention of AIDS: Directions for Sociological Research.

¶ AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) education has employed virtually all communication channels in efforts to reach different populations & persuade them to adopt protective behaviors. Psychological theories of learning & behavioral change have greatly influenced the design of AIDS education material & format, the guidance of social science theory & research has been much less. Here, principles of structural contingency theory, used to explain the structure & performance of organizations, are extended to deduce testable propositions about the most effective communication channels for different communities. From the perspective of structural contingency theory, channels of communication are organizational structures that link formal organizations to target communities, prevention objectives are the tasks that the organizations perform, & communities are the task environment. Prevention objectives & communities are ranked with respect to the presence of four barriers that impede communication of educational messages: selective listening, selective interpretation, technical complexity, & size & expansiveness of the target community. Channels of communications are ranked high economic problem. However, when one carefully sifts through Wilson's model & his application of it to US racial history, a number of problems arise. Two of his central concepts, economic competition & political power, are too ambiguously defined to be of any use for other analysts. Moreover, the model is unable to explain significant differences in both the level & form of racial oppression in different historical eras. Many of the problems of Wilson's model are ultimately attributable to his overdependence on a very narrowly defined materialist interpretation of race relations.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

* Part of a study in the sociology of ethnicity & oral history, initiated in late 1987, that uses the oral history method to examine the contribution of older ethnic women from non-English-speaking backgrounds (NESB) who migrated in the immediate postwar period to South Australia. The large number of postwar NESB immigrants from Europe admitted selectively to enhance the L.E., followed by a decrease in the 1970s of such migration, has resulted in a significant proportion of aged among the NESB group. Here, in-depth interviews were conducted with 12 NESB Is to illuminate their childhood & wartime experiences, reasons for migration to Australia, initial experiences as migrants, life in Australia, contacts & visits to country of origin, & old age impressions. Preliminary findings reveal that Rs came from varied SE backgrounds, suffered from the effects of war but still cherish their childhood memories, feel a strong commitment to their traditions, values, & language, & revere education. Most Is found semiskilled employment & feel proud to have contributed to a better life in Australia for themselves & their children. These findings are discussed against a background of the status of ethnic women in Australian society & the growing emphasis on multiculturalism.

Mulkey, Lynn M. (Dept Sociology Hunter Coll, New York NY 10021). An Empirical Investigation of Attitudes toward Women in Science.

* Literature regarding links between early childhood socialization & later recruitment to science is reviewed, including work with the Women in Science Scale (WiSS), validated for early adolescents aged 10-16 (Smith & Erb, 1986). The WiSS discriminates differences in attitudes, with Fs manifesting significantly more positive attitudes toward women scientists than Ms. Other studies show that children aged 11-13 cultivate attitudes associated with stereotypical images of M/F dress & occupation (Kohlberg & Ullian, 1973; Fagot, Leinbach, & Hagan, 1986) & suggest a need for further validation of the WiSS by revising it to accommodate young children. Here, the use of the Early Childhood Women in Science Scale (ECWiSS, Mulkey, 1988), containing 4-point Likert-type measures, with a sample of 713 students in grades K-4 in New York City schools is reported, controls for gender, race, SES, age, & ability were introduced. ● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

* An agency that provides residential services to people with psychiatric disabilities was examined following service delivery model changes in 1984, using data gathered through interviewing & analysis of agency records. The old model was a congregate-living model based on a view of clients as patients-in-the-community who needed a dress rehearsal prior to being able to live independently. Over time, the old model became an end-point in the community mental health service system because it did not move clients to independent living, which was incompatible with overall system philosophy that stresses independent living. The new model provides staff support to clients in finding places of their own to live, & help in building their natural social networks. Clients live independently, with staff support that can be intensified when needed or, finally, withdrawn altogether. The comparison indicates that the new model, with its dispersed client homes, is a viable alternative to a traditional congregate living model.

§ Researchers have long assumed that small business is the main avenue for economic mobility for minority groups, especially for immigrant groups. An investigation of the relationship between ethnic business & economic mobility using interview data from a sample of 557 Korean immigrants in Los Angeles, Calif, focuses on two issues: (1) the employment potential of Korean businesses for the Korean community, & (2) the economic advantages of self-employed families in comparison to those not self-employed. The findings show that Korean self-employed families as a group earn a substantially higher income & maintain a higher standard of living than employed families. Significantly, self-employed Koreans receive greater returns from their education & language skills than those not self-employed. Moreover, Korean businesses provide jobs for 15% of the Korean LF in Los Angeles, 45% business owners & 30% ethnic employees. Thus, Korean ethnic business helps not only Korean immigrant entrepreneurs but also the Korean immigrant community as a whole by creating jobs for new arrivals.

While much evidence suggests the ability to transform overlapping social & institutional networks into coherent strategies of class action, more problematic is an analysis of the consequences of this unity. Explored is how understanding of capitalist class structure may be used to analyze the implications of class rule. Rich areas for study include the impact of a unified class on the organization of work in both the US & the Third World, industrial decline, & relations with the international community. Specific focus is on implications for the restructuring of the health care sector.

§ An examination of occupational effects of community Coll attendance for a cross sectional sample of young Ms drawn from the Parnes data (not further identified). It is argued that community Coll entrance negatively shapes adult occupational status even when controlling for years of education, IQ, attainment of a BA degree, & other relevant background variables. Community Coll students are generally perceived as less motivated & talented, & from a poorer SES than four-year Coll entrants. Such labeling depresses occupational achievements of community Coll entrants unless they transfer & complete the BA degree. It is not sufficient for community Coll entrants to merely acquire additional years of schooling. The reverse holds true for four-year Coll entrants. Community Coll entrance entails more of an occupational penalty for blacks than for whites. The occupational status of black four-year Coll entrants' jobs is 18 points higher (on the Duncan scale) than black community Coll entrants. Community Coll entrance negatively impacts adult status attainment largely via negative labeling effects.

Montgomery, Kathleen (Dept Sociology U California, Los Angeles 90024). The Threat of Corporatization and Its Recapture by the Medical Profession.

§ Evidence & implications of internal shifts in the medical profession as a response to external forces of change within health care are explored, following Eliot Freidson's prediction in "The Reorganization of the Medical Profession" (Medical Care Review, 1985, 42, 11-35). The move toward "corporatized" health care is reviewed, & the threat of corporate ideology to MDs' traditional position of dominance is proposed. One response to this threat is examined, using data from a recent survey of 1,000 MDs who have left clinical work to become part of an administrative elite. Their career motivations, commitments, & goals are compared with those of the profession in general, based on data from the American Medical Assoc Physician Masterfile, augmented by survey data. Centrality, and Influence in Interorganizational Networks: A Comparison of Eight Community Support Sites.

§ The Community Support Program (CSP) of the National Institute of Mental Health was designed in the wake of deinstitutionalization to provide services to seriously mentally ill persons living in the community. A primary objective of the program is the development of a cohesive, integrated system of service-providing organizations, led by a "core agency" responsible for system development & coordination. An analysis is presented illustrating variations in dimensions of local service systems: network cohesiveness, centrality of key organizations, & influence of key organizations that may have an impact on the ultimate CSP goal of improved personal & community adjustment of the target population. Data on frequency of contact with other organizations & perceptions of organizational influence were obtained in interviews with 156 organization directors in 8 CSP sites in Ore. Multidimensional scaling analysis was used to represent contact patterns & organizational position for each network. The findings, presented in detail, show that CSP objectives regarding system development have been only partially met, especially with regard to network cohesiveness. Further research incorporating these network dimensions in assessment of client outcomes will help evaluate whether the system-level guidelines of the CSP model should be strengthened or modified.

§ Formal institutional locations & informal participation in elite networks are examined for women & men occupying principal decision-making positions in powerful institutions in three advanced societies: Australia, the Federal Republic of Germany, & the US. The data, taken from comparable surveys of elite position holders in the three nations, yield similar results cross-nationally, demonstrating significant gender differences. In all three elites, the few women are concentrated in a small number of positions, especially those set aside for women, & are largely absent from other sectors & positions. Network analyses reveal, in addition, that men are more integrated than women in informal elite networks in all three nations. Social backgrounds also vary, with women in each of the three elites coming from somewhat higher SS & SC origins than their M counterparts. The results suggest that women in formal positions of power remain outsiders on the inside.

Operationalizing embeddedness in terms of Baumgartner's network model of nonconfrontation & confrontation, network analyses of field data collected from the executive levels of two large corporations support the argument that top managers in loose-knit networks tend to handle conflict without directly confronting opponents & those in dense-knit networks tend to engage in direct actions against adversaries, even when controlling for disputant perceptions of conflict seriousness & socialized perceptions of power differentials between themselves & their colleagues.

Moskowitz, Eric S. (Dept Political Science Coll Wooster, OH 44691). Politics, Race and Employment: A Conceptual Reconsideration of Wilson's Model of Racial Antagonism across Historical Eras.

§ William J. Wilson, in The Declining Significance of Race, has offered a controversial analysis of US race relations. Most of the controversy has surrounded his interpretation of the simultaneous growth of a successful black Mc & an entrapped black Ur underclass. Unfortunately, little attention has been paid to Wilson's ambitious attempt to create a comprehensive model of US race relations, which seeks to explain the variations in the levels & forms of racial antagonism across a series of historical epochs. The core of Wilson's model maintains that in a complex industrial economy, racial oppression will exist at higher levels when the white & black Wcs are in economic competition with one another & when the white Wc has the political power to enforce a racial solution to their con-between two models of domination: control over capital, & control over knowledge. Control over capital has been the primary model. In "late capitalism," the nature of this relationship has become ambiguous. Through a series of historical transformations, structural differences between these forms have led to the creation of rival dominant SCs, the "old" & "new" classes. During the period of transition, this new form of domination shares with its predecessor the contradiction between private appropriation & socialized production. Yet the properties of its focal point (knowledge) change the nature of this contradiction. While Alvin Gouldner's concept of the culture of critical discourse (The Future of Intellectuals and the Rise of the New Class [see IRPS No. 8, 81c00020]) is useful in understanding the basis of the new class, his concept of cultural capital has problems. It obscures the fact that, while knowledge may come to resemble capital, the imputation of value at the point of production implies an entirely different project of class formation. Applying social closure theory, new class formation can be understood as a process whereby the "core" (intellectuals) penetrates the periphery (technical intelligentsia).

By conducting scale constructions & path analyses with data obtained from US & Japanese affiliates in Indonesia & the Philippines (N = 75 & 70, respectively), the effectiveness of the policies was examined. It was found that, despite some success by local partners in infiltrating into affiliate management, the policies clearly face limitations due to MNCs' strategy to seclude decision-making structure from local partners, & to the fact that MNCs' informal cooptation strategy results in a contradictory effect, by shifting the locus of final decision making from affiliates to parent companies.

Olzak, Susan (Cornell U., Ithaca, NY 14853), Were the Causes of Racial Conflicts and Lynchings in the Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Century America the Same?

* How similar were the causes of Rurality lynching & Ur antiblack violence at the turn of the nineteenth century? Using data on aggregated counts of lynching & event-histories of Ur violence against blacks, this question is answered by comparing analyses of lynching with Ur violence in the country as a whole & with that in the southern states. The results show that economic prosperity for laborers increased the likelihood of black/white confrontations in the forms of both lynching & Ur violence. However, changes in economic prosperity for laborers significantly decreased rates of Ur violence against blacks, although not in the South & not for lynching. Finally, two measures that shaped the economies of the Rurality South & Ur North during this period—fluctuations in the cotton economy & the enormous influx of immigrants—appear to have had divergent effects on lynching & Ur violence, as was expected.

* Arguments about the dynamics of an ethnic/racial job queue are applied to an analysis of causes of changes in occupational segregation for the foreign-born in US cities from 1870 to 1880. The evidence lends credibility to the queue hypothesis that the presence of lower-status blacks enabled some white ethnics to move up the job queue & out of segregated occupations. The findings are that cities that had initially large & growing numbers of blacks had decreasing occupational segregation for foreigners, while those with growing numbers of foreigners had increasing levels of segregation for foreigners. Where there were a larger number of illiterate blacks, levels of segregation for the foreign-born decreased, but the numbers of foreign-born who were illiterate did not affect occupational segregation for the foreign-born during this period. Finally, as queueing & human capital theories hold, expansion of the LF decreased occupational segregation of foreigners over this decade.

O'Meara, Don (Raymond Walters Coll U Cincinnati, OH 45236), Cross-Sex Friendships: Basic Challenges of a Scriptless Relationship.

* Cross-sex friendship is seen as a generally ignored yet significant personal relationship in US culture. The relationship is scriptless in the sense that the dyad must rely heavily on private identity bargaining rather than cultural guidelines to socially construct a shared meaning of their friendship. Several basic principles for exploring the nature of cross-sex friendship are noted: (1) the utility of the negotiated order framework, (2) using the friendship dyad itself, rather than the individual members, as the unit of analysis, (3) applying the process of the looking glass self for understanding the development of a mutual dyad-identity, & (4) taking into account the structural context of the ongoing negotiations, particularly the existence within US culture of gender-schematic & heterosexuality-subchematic information processing. Four basic negotiation challenges for the cross-sex friendship dyad are identified: (A) determining the type of emotional bond represented by the relationship (romantic love or friendship love), (B) confronting the issue of sexuality, (C) dealing with the issue of relationship equality within a cultural context of gender inequality, & (D) presenting the relationship as authentic to relevant audiences.

* Neighborhood associations are visible actors in metropolitan politics. Here, social & political factors that affect the ability of such groups to accomplish their objectives are examined, using survey data collected from 62 neighborhood improvement associations in Seattle, Wash, during 1979/80. Results indicate that association effectiveness is a complicated phenomenon, correlates depend on the issues addressed. As could be expected, poor areas generally produce less successful associations, however, this relationship was not replicated for service or land use issues. Effectiveness also hinges on the quality of resources mobilized, rather than the quantity, & the internal political structure of the association.

* Based on a review of the literature, a broad interpretation of the historical trajectory of anomie is presented, & directions for research are suggested. It is argued that anomie is not unilaterally an undesirable phenomenon of modern advanced societies, it is also, & crucially, a positive, significant ingredient of modernity. This claim is not altogether new—it was made in Guyan's (1885) & Emile Durkheim's (1933) work—but its implications have never been fully articulated.

Orru, Marco, Hamilton, Gary G. & Suzuki, Mariko (Dept Sociology U South Florida, Tampa 33620), Patterns of Domination in Japanese Business.

* An institutional theory of power is adopted to explain the peculiar patterns of vertical & horizontal domination that obtain in interfirm relations within & among large Japanese business groups. The adequacy of 3 different theories of power in capitalist business is assessed, & tested in a case study of 6 intermarket & 10 independent Japanese business groups. Forms of vertical & horizontal domination are identified through an analysis of patterns of interfirm shareholding, & it is shown how additional means of domination are adopted to reinforce the existing vertical & horizontal patterns. The highly structured & cohesive interfirm relations in Japanese business are contrasted with the more loosely organized pattern characteristic in the US. It is argued that current research on capitalist forms of domination will be more likely to advance by emphasizing not the unchanging nature of capitalist domination, but rather its cross-cultural diversity.

¶ The relationship between acculturation of Mexican American clinic patients & their life style was analyzed. Active Mexican American diabetes & cardiovascular patients ($N = 80$) were selected from a primary care clinic located in Orange County, Calif. Acculturation was measured by an index (place of birth, length of residence in the U.S., & language spoken at home). Lifestyle was measured by f of exercise, consumption of alcohol & coffee, & sleep per 24 hour period. It was found that 33% of Mexican American patients who had resided in the U.S. for 5+ years never exercised, compared to 66% of those with 4 years residence or less. Mexican American patients who spoke English at home were more likely to sleep fewer hours than those who spoke Spanish. While alcohol consumption was related to length of residence in the U.S., coffee consumption was not related to any of the acculturation index components. However, the overall acculturation index had no significant relationship to life style. This finding suggests that level of acculturation among Mexican American patients appears to have no significant bearing on their lifestyle.

To examine this idea, as it applies to homosexuals, questionnaire data were collected from 283 gay men & lesbians. The findings are used to discuss four types of social support: tangible, appraisal, belonging, & self-esteem. Differences between men & women are noted, with respect to demographic variables, e.g., age & education, & type of friendship (casual, close, & best friend). Also examined are findings about Rs number of friends, what they do & talk about with friends, & what their expectations are about their friends. Discussion focuses on the unique aspects of friendships in the lives of gay men & lesbians.

¶ Many programs for behavior change exhibit a psychological or bureaucratic control bias, factors that often produce exploitation, resentment, & program failure. Here, a sociological approach to behavior change is advanced, with focus on four concepts that concern interpersonal processes: (1) fair rewards, (2) personal relationships, (3) positive identity, & (4) mutual social accounting. Two examples of programs are presented that apply these concepts. Theory of management & Glasser's school reforms & research findings on organizational development & education are discussed that support the utility of a sociological approach to behavior change. It is concluded that programs informed by a sociological approach may face resistance from those in authority roles because such programs will call for more equal reward distributions.

The development of sport reflected in many ways in microcosm the developing South African colonial society & was closely linked to colonial politics. This is evident on the institutional level, in the organizational structures that developed, the value systems that became entrenched in sport, African responses to colonialism, the role of sport in the process of African SC formation, & the way the growth of sport closely followed the pattern of historical development in South Africa. Particular attention is given to the efforts of the emerging black petite bourgeoisie to use sport as a means of achieving upward mobility in colonial social & political life.

Four factors explain why 70% did not sign, ie, lack of sympathy with the peace movement, contact, motivation, & opportunity to sign. In May 1985 a telephone survey was conducted among 224 citizens of 4 Dutch towns, only sympathizers of the peace movement were contacted for a second interview in Dec 1985 ($N = 152$). The findings show that: (1) 82% of Rs felt sympathy for the movement, ie, positive attitudes toward its goals, activities, & members, (2) however, only 69% were willing to sign the petition, with 13% refraining due to lack of motivation, (3) only 4% of those who intended to sign did not because of barriers to opportunity, & (4) 16% of Rs did not sign because of an interaction of motivational & network factors, primarily because they were less frequently contacted by the movement. As a consequence, 40% of the sympathizers refrained from signing.

¶ The factors promoting & inhibiting transfer & the attainment of the BA degree are examined, based on telephone interviews conducted with minority (predominantly black & Mexican-American) students who received Ford Foundation Upper Division Scholarships between 1971 & 1975 & who had transferred from a 2-year to a 4-year Coll. Each of the 24 pairs consisting of 1 BA recipient & 1 nonrecipient were matched according to gender, race/ethnicity, age, parents' education & occupation & initial community Coll major; this information was obtained from mail questionnaires completed by each R 2 years prior to the study. Results show that in high school, the BA degree recipients were more likely to have been enrolled in the Coll preparatory track than the nonrecipients. In community Colls, the BA recipients were more likely than nonrecipients to see their instructors & counselors as helpful & to be members of a campus organization. In the 4-year Coll, the BA degree recipients were less likely to have lost credits when they transferred & more likely to live on campus & to say that their instructors & classmates were helpful than the nonrecipients. These findings are related to previous research recommendations made regarding how both 2-year & 4-year Colls can increase the number of minority students who transfer to 4-year Colls & receive the BA degree.

Porto, Emma (U Hawaii Honolulu 96822), Gender, Ethnicity, Household and Class Formation: The Case of Asian-Americans in Hawaii.

¶ The multiple oppression hypothesis suggests that to understand the white women's status in the US, the following variables have to be considered: race, class, sexism, & homophobia. This framework is applied in an examination of the position of Asian-American women in Hawaii, particularly Japanese & Filipinos, & a model that integrates the above variables in a historical-structural perspective is proposed. It improves Chant's (1985) proposed holistic paradigm by specifying how the variables interact given the development of the political economy of Hawaii & how Asian-American women have been incorporated into the labor & marriage market, thus, historically & structurally defining their position & life chances within the context of their families & households. Implications of these findings for the integration of nonwhite women's experiences in feminist theory & literature in the US are suggested.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 22 pp.

¶ Two interrelated issues in the debate between neo-Marxist & state-centered conceptions of the state are examined: the extent to which the state acts on behalf of class factions, & the process whereby state policies are articulated. It is argued that capital-state relations are linked to intra-class conflicts, & that the outcome of intraclass struggles & the content of state policy are conditioned by existing state structures. These positions are evaluated by employing a qualitative, historical analysis of legislation that affected steel capital-state relations between 1968 & 1984. The findings suggest that when the accumulation process itself cannot provide the capital or environmental certainty to ensure continued accumulation, the state implements policies to facilitate accumulation. The precise content of state policies, however, is the outcome of political struggles among state managers, existing laws, the organizational structure of the state, & the political power of factors of capital. It is concluded that (1) state policies are affected by powerful class factions, which support the neo-Marxist argument that the state is only relatively autonomous, & (2) state policy is affected by the organizational structure & legal system, which provides partial support for state-centered theories.

¶ In an adversarial system of justice seeking to be rational & fair, basing its decisions on facts that can be validated, the role of the expert becomes singularly important. Section 2034 (the "Expert Disclosure" rule) of the Calif Code of Civil Procedure mandates that expert witness lists be exchanged by adverse parties if any party makes such a request. The history & rationale of this rule, as well as its theoretical & practical application, are explored. The relationships among legislative enactment, judicial decision making, & attorney behavior are examined. The Expert Disclosure rule exemplifies knowledge management in the law, a process that can be followed throughout the legal enterprise. A Solk approach is applied to understanding the operation of this rule & the law's ability to control who knows what & when they are able to know it. The work of Max Weber, Karl Mannheim, & contemporary theorists is used to place this kind of knowledge management within a wider legal & sociological context. Implications for theories of control & the Solk, technology, & the increasing importance of technical expertise are drawn.

¶ An examination of the occupational achievement process of Hispanic, black, & white young Ms & Fs 7.5 years after graduating from high school, using data from the National Longitudinal Study of the High School Class of 1972. The key findings are: (1) Mexican origin has a small & indirect impact through postsecondary education on occupational status for both Hispanics & Fs. (2) For Hispanics, a non-English home language has no sizeable direct nor indirect effect on occupational status. (3) With the exception of white women, postsecondary education has a substantial positive impact on occupational status. (4) For Hispanics, Mexican origin & non-English home language has no impact on wages. (5) Postsecondary education has a modest positive influence on the wages of black Ms, while for their Hispanic & white counterparts the influence of education on wages is positive but trivial. Education has a modest & positive influence on the wages of Hispanic & black Fs, whereas for white Fs, the impact of schooling on wages is moderate & positive. (6) Labor market wage & unemployment rates are the only regional & ecological variables that have an impact on wages; this influence, however, is modest.

¶ Two explanations of gender differences in well-being that focus on social roles are defined. The exposure perspective suggests that Ms' & Fs' typically different role configurations can account for much of the observed difference in well-being. The vulnerability perspective contends that roles impact Ms & Fs differently. Issues raised by these two hypotheses are explored in the context of a model in which self-esteem & social support are intervening variables in the relationship between roles & two measures of well-being. Data from a national probability sample of adults provide some support for both perspectives. Some roles appear to impact Ms & Fs similarly, but there is also evidence of differential impact. Most of the differences in the impact of roles appear to involve social support.

is made here to examine emotion & gender together in the context of sport involvement. Guided by the symbolic interactionist & emotion management perspective, the valence of gender is investigated among a highly visible group of workers, Male athletes in intercollegiate & professional sports, by focusing on the emotional dimension of their labor: what emotions they work on, how they work on them, & how they work on the emotions of others, in light of their 'situational gender identity' within the social world of sport. Emotion is shown to be involved in getting 'psyched up' for competition, & in 'psyching out' opponents. The Male athlete's 'game face' is examined as a form of display work & as a method of psyching out the opponent. Finally, the emotional cost of their labor, gender, & occupational roles & the implications they present are discussed.

¶ Feminist theory has shifted in the 1980s from critical analyses of social structures, defined & dominated by men, toward a focus on women themselves. One sign of this shift is the dramatic increase in research & theorizing about the interrelationship of race, SC, & gender. Following an overview of two major trends in feminist theory to show the shift from a rejection of differences among women (to emphasize 'sisterhood') to the explicit analysis of differences, recent conceptualizations of a 'feminist standpoint' are discussed, & the question is raised of whether more specific (race/SC/ethnicity) definitions are needed. Socialist feminist theorizing on the interrelationship of gender & SC is highlighted, & gender SC theories are illustrated with the different life experiences of professional & W/Cuban women. Three major theories of racial oppression & the role of black families are presented & developed by examining black women's experiences of the intersection of race, SC, & gender, as well as the role of black families in a society that defines the Mc white family as the norm. Feminist theory must go beyond advocating tolerance of differences among women & recognize the creative function of differences in women's experiences in order to understand the core of various types of oppression & to work out strategies for change.

¶ An investigation of the effects of organizational change & objective working conditions on workers employed by an ultra-high technology firm. A contingency explanation of technological change is identified that aids in specifying hypotheses regarding worker reactions both to organizational change as well as day to day work within a technologically advanced environment. Analysis of covariance of survey data (N = 462 Rs) is used to study the effects of occupation, educational attainment, skill, experience, & tenure on job satisfaction, authority relationships, reactions to organizational change, technological optimism, & worker expectations for future job arrangements. Findings suggest that occupation is a major contingency in the prediction of almost every measure in the analysis. Managers & lower level clerical workers had more positive & optimistic attitudes, while non computer professionals & scientists had negative attitudes & more pessimistic profiles. These findings are interpreted within the context of description of the history, structure, & working conditions within the firm, implications for future work environments within US society are considered.

¶ An examination of the nature & extent of the dropout problem among Hispanics, compared to non-Hispanic whites & blacks, using data from the sophomore cohort of High School & Beyond, a national longitudinal study of high school students initiated in 1980. Dropping out is predicted with measures of scholastic achievement, SE background, & demographic characteristics. For Hispanics, the effects of language factors & nativity on dropping out are also explored. With the exception of SES, the results show similar patterns of effects across groups. Higher SES is a more important deterrent to dropping out among non-Hispanic whites than among Hispanics & non-Hispanic blacks. Simulations of dropout rates based on these analyses reveal that much of the difference observed between Hispanics & non-Hispanic whites is due to variations in average background characteristics.

Correction factors involving arcsine, probit, & logit transformations, & a residualizing procedure are conducted. ¶ An exploration of the ethical, social, political, & economic context of in vitro fertilization (IVF) in the U.S., Australia, & GB. The social contexts were analyzed using qualitative data from documents, inter science journals, & news sources. The ethical & religious context, political concerns, political & legal issues, & market factors were considered in the 3 countries. The location & nature of IVF research was ascertained through a content analysis of all medical research articles in English, French, or German that were abstracted in the Cumulated Index Medicus between 1976 & 1984 (N = 123). The medical dependence, national location of the first named author, national location of journal, & sex of all authors were coded. The three countries were compared with respect to the focus of IVF research conducted, publication patterns, & the sex of first listed & other authors, using tabular analysis. It is concluded that both ethical & market contexts may have influenced the direction of the research.

Analysis of the impact of demographic, human capital, & organizational characteristics on departure rates reveals that departure rates from the company decline as the level of attained achievement in the company increases. (2) Departure rates are lower in locations in the company with high promotion rates than in locations with low promotion rates, keeping the level of already obtained achievement constant. This finding suggests that studies of organizational careers & organizational departures need to be integrated, de-

Riggins, Stephen Harold (Dept Sociology U Alberta, Edmonton T6G 2H4). Erving Goffman and the Study of Domestic Objects.

A typology of material artifacts, based on the work of Erving Goffman, developed as an aid in theorizing about the relationship between the objects & objects found in domestic environments. Isolated insights about material objects as mediators of interaction & relationships are found throughout the work of Goffman & other symbolic interactionists. Goffman tended to include objects & human actions within each of his categories of symbols, resulting in some insensitivity to the physical reality of material artifacts. Here, Goffman's categories of symbols are redefined to exclude human actions, & several dimensions of objects are added to develop a more systematic typology. Three important dimensions neglected by Goffman: how objects are displayed in relation to each other & to space; terms that summarize the general character of a whole environment; & concepts found in verbal accounts given by people when they talk about their personal relation to objects. As an illustration, the typology is used to describe the material artifacts found in an artist's living room.

Rindfuss, Ronald R. & Jones, Jo Ann (Dept Sociology U North Carolina, Chapel Hill 27516). One Parent or Two? The Intertwining of American Marriage and Fertility Patterns.

Marriage & fertility in the US have become less firmly entwined: more women are bearing & rearing children without marrying, & more couples with children are divorcing. These two trends augment each other: that today a sizeable number & proportion of children are expected to spend a portion of their childhood in 1-parent households. Here, the vital & fertility histories provided in the National Survey of Family Growth Cycle III are used to estimate the probability that children aged 13 in 1982 are living in 2-parent households while controlling for their mothers' marital statuses at births. Results show that marital status at birth is an important predictor of household structure at later ages: for males, there is a convergence of probabilities around ages 8 or 9, for males the convergence is not as pronounced & occurs later. It is concluded that although mother's marital status at birth is an important factor in later household structure, the childhood environment is actually more elastic as women marry, divorce, remarry, & red divorce.

Ritchey, Ferris J. (Dept Sociology U Alabama, Birmingham 35294). Sex Differentials in Physical Symptomatology among the Homeless: A Test of the Disaffiliation Hypothesis.

An examination of the question of whether homelessness leads to medical disaffiliation. Survey data from a random sample of 150 homeless persons in Birmingham, Ala, revealing sex differentials in physical symptomatology are compared to existing data on sex differentials in the general population. Generally, Fs report a greater incidence of physical conditions than Ms, beyond what could be accounted for by reproductive illnesses. These differences have been hypothesized to result from gender-related differences & reporting bias, as well as biological factors. The circumstances of homelessness lead to the hypothesis that sex identity & relationship to disease, illness perception, & reporting bias would be altered in such a way that Ms would report as high or higher morbidity rates than Fs, indicative of medical disaffiliation. However, the survey results indicate that homeless Fs report higher numbers of symptoms than homeless Ms, thus supporting the integrationist hypothesis that the homeless maintain essential ties to the community.

Robbins, James M., Kirmayer, Laurence J. & Kapusta, Morton A. (Jewish General Hospital ICFP, 4333 Cote Sainte Catherine Rd, Montreal H3T 1E4 Quebec). Illness Worry and Disability in Fibromyalgia Syndrome.

An examination of whether exaggerated somatic concern (body awareness & illness worry) might explain the distress & disability expressed by fibromyalgia syndrome (FM) patients. Twenty FM patients were compared to 23 rheumatoid arthritis (RA) patients on measures of depressive & somatic symptomatology, pain, disability, & somatic concern. FM patients reported greater somatic symptomatology, equivalent levels of pain, & less physical disability than did RA patients. Contrary to expectations, FM patients were no higher on somatic concern measures. However, illness worry correlated highly with physical disability only among FM patients. Results suggest two models of disability in chronic illness. In the case of illness with identifiable pathophysiology, as in RA, disability follows closely the observable physical damage that accompanies the disease. When no definite disease is identified & no simple reassuring explanation is forthcoming, as in FM, disability is strongly determined by the patient's worry about having a serious disease. Interventions designed to encourage activity & modify illness worry early in the illness experience may reduce chronic disability in patients with FM & related functional somatic symptoms.

Roberts, Carl W. & Goddu, Andre (Sociology Dept Iowa State U, Ames 50010). The Decline of Christendom in the Middle Ages: Mannheim's Contribution to the Weberian Thesis.

Max Weber described ideological developments of the late Middle Ages as a gradual metamorphosis of Roman Catholic ideas into Calvinist ones. Catholic ideas were modified, because they lacked legitimacy (ie, correspondence to the realities of growing medieval Ur societies). In contrast, Karl Mannheim depicted ideologies as static & as existing among a plurality of other ideological perspectives. Instead of explaining ideological shifts in terms of changing ideas, Mannheim argued that ideological perspectives are adopted when they make sense (or are credible) within one's sociohistorical context. The extent to which a particular perspective is adopted is an indication of the credibility that perspective has over others. A quantitative analysis is performed on data coded from English translations of 304 accounts of exorcisms that were written between the fourth & seventeenth centuries. A steady decline from the eleventh to fourteenth was found in the depiction (&, by extension, the credibility) of Church officials' dispensation of divine grace. It is argued that during the European economic boom prior to the fourteenth century, the Catholic Church was less prominent as the mediator of grace for the alleviation of suffering. When the catastrophes of the fourteenth century occurred not only was the Church unable to cure famine or plague, it was also unable to regain its claim to be the sole credible source of divine solace.

Access to research funds has become increasingly important in production of scholarly research & advancement of academic careers. Here, sociological research published in major journals 1974-1983 is examined to determine whether author gender, article topic, & methods are systematically related to acknowledgement of internal or extramural funding support. Logistic regressions reveal no systematic associations between these variables & acknowledgement of internal research funding by authors. Support from extramural sources is significantly related to author gender & to article topic. M authors writing about topics other than gender acknowledged extramural support significantly more often than did Ms publishing articles about gender issues or F authors, regardless of the topic of their research. The strongest relationships appeared between methods & external funding, with quantitative articles acknowledging funding significantly more often than nonquantitative studies. Implications for gender equity in sociological publication are explored.

Roos, Patricia A. (Dept Sociology State U New York, Stony Brook 11794). Hot Type to Cold Type: Sex Differences in the Impact of Technological Change in the Printing Industry.

During the 1970s print composing rooms underwent a dramatic change in the technology of production, with composition workers switching from hot type (hot-metal linotypes) to cold type (electronic composition). Concomitant with this change was an equally remarkable shift in the sex composition of typesetters, from 17% to 56% F. Thus, in one decade a predominantly M, blue-collar occupation was transformed into a majority F, white-collar job. Here, examined is whether women's job & earnings prospects were upgraded with occupational integration, or whether traditional F/SE roles were reinforced. Data from the 1970 & 1980 Census Public Use Microdata are used to (1) investigate the effect of technological change on women's ability to enter composition & evaluate to what extent this constitutes "progress", (2) compare women's economic opportunities in typesetting with those in other occupations to which they have traditionally had access, (3) contrast selected characteristics of typesetters & compositors in 1970 & 1980, & (4) investigate sex differences in ¶ Using the metaphor of generational equity, Social Security program critics argue that older people are usurping an unjust proportion of the nation's limited wealth. Social Security is responsible for the federal deficit, & entitlement programs reduce investments in future economic growth. Here, the changing character of public debate surrounding Social Security is traced, & contextualized in terms of the reconfiguration of US politics during the 1970s & 1980s. Also examined is the nature of US public policy, with focus on why poverty among children is not viewed as a labor problem to be resolved by improving job opportunities for parents in poor families. Evidence indicates that the real issue surrounding the debate about entitlements is not generational equity but class conflict over welfare programs that reduce the proportion of the national wage bill subject to market forces.

Ramirez, Francisco O. & Boli, John (School Education Stanford U, CA 94305). The Rise of Compulsory Schooling in the Western Cultural Context: Common Frame and Varying Obstacles.

¶ Theoretical efforts to explain the rise of mass schooling often proceed from the functionalist assumption that mass schooling developed as a rational solution to domestic problems brought about by the intensification of social differentiation. This assumption is found in both mainstream & critical functionalist analyses, but is inconsistent with much historiographical evidence as well as with research findings on the socialization effects of schooling. Here, an alternative theoretical argument is presented that views mass schooling as an institutional consequence of the development of the cultural framework of the West, which gave rise to calls for compulsory education, mass schooling, & compulsory mass schooling. The variability in the timing of the establishment of compulsory mass schooling rules & the formation of national educational ministries across nation states in the nineteenth century is also discussed. The sources of varying obstacles to the institutionalization of mass schooling are considered with reference to the distinction between statist & individualist modes of organizing the national polity. It is concluded that the movement toward compulsory mass schooling took place earlier & more completely in the more statist polities that were well-integrated within the Western frame.

¶ A report on field research involving observation of & interviews with women in the process of changing their sexual identities from heterosexual to lesbian. Although lesbianism is most commonly thought of as a sexual term (ie, connoting sexual activity between women), findings indicate that sexual activity is the least salient ingredient in sexual identity formation. Almost 50% of Ss had not had a sexual interaction with another woman before identifying as lesbian, ie, they were lesbian virgins. These results suggest that the claiming of a sexual identity is based on something other than a sexual act. Perhaps the only commonality among Ss was their construction of a lesbian identity prior to losing their lesbian virginity. Rather than focusing on a particular act, or the omission of a particular act, the formation & maintenance of a sexual identity is dependent on the meaning an individual attaches to her life experiences.

¶ The usefulness of six hypotheses or perspectives for describing the processes leading to the birth of new business organizations are considered in relation to (1) patterns found in an analysis of new firms emerging in all industry sectors & 23 regions (Ru & Ur) of Minn & Pa., & (2) survey data on 3,000+ new firms in these 2 states. Little support is found for business climate hypothesis, ie, creation of new firms where factor production are the cheapest. Substantial evidence supports the population ecology/turnover hypothesis, ie, continual replacement of firms to satisfy the environmental demand for organizational outputs, for all industry sectors. The incubator hypothesis, ie, births enhanced by dense networks of suppliers & clients, receives support for new firms in manufacturing, distributive service, & business services. Modest evidence supports the unemployment hypothesis (new firms as a reaction to poor prospects), but only for new firms in retail, construction, & consumer service industries. Those participating in start-up teams are generally well-educated, midcareer adults with multiple financial, personal autonomy, & substantive or task interests, all consistent with a career opportunity perspective. They do not appear dominated by any one objective indicating little support for the driven entrepreneur hypothesis.

¶ Gender differences in psychological distress among future MDs are addressed from contrasting role-related stress & socialization-based vulnerability perspectives. A medical student cohort (N = 210) was surveyed at medical school entrance (T1) & after 1 year of training (T2), focus on earlier familial relationships, personality, & social support resources, perceived medical school stressors, & alcohol consumption & depressive & anxiety symptomatology. Relative to socialization perspectives, sexes manifested more similarities than differences at T1, although manifested lower overall psychopathology, but greater perceived paternal overprotection in childhood. Relative to role stress perspectives, both sexes reported increased psychopathology at T2. The sexes did not differ in perceived medical-school-related stressors, while Fs manifested better social supports at T2. The psychosocial predictors of increased subjective distress for both sexes included perceived earlier familial relationships, medical school stressors. The only predictor of increased drinking (Ms) was T1 drinking level. Future research on gender roles & distress should assess both M & F modes of psychopathology & should add antecedents of role entrance in addition to the (presumed) consequences of role incumbency.

The Stability of Rank: On an Alternative Statistical Interpretation of the Quantity of Mobility over the Life Cycle.

A description of an alternative to status attainment modeling of life cycles originated by Blau & Duncan (1967). Statistically, a new way of representing causal chains is proposed, which is less complex, & more easily comprehended & communicated. Conceptually, a focus on life chances, defined as the probability distribution over hierarchical outcomes, is proposed. Change & stability in life chances across life cycle stage address a lacuna in the original approach, i.e., the numerical assessment of the amount of mobility (& immobility). Applied to the original data, this life chance perspective leads to a substantive reinterpretation: mobility is far less prevalent than it previously appeared.

$0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 31 pp.

The last fifty years have witnessed a transformation of the place of Sigmund Freud & psychoanalysis in US culture. Social theorists such as Kingsley Davis (1938) & Philip Rieff ("The American Transference From Calvin to Freud," Atlantic 1961, July, 105-106) have claimed that there is a consistency between psychoanalytic theory & individualism embedded in the US' Protestant, particularly Calvinist, past. However, while psychoanalysis was proclaimed the new secular religion of the Me in the 1950s, since then there has been a decline in the popularity of Freudian therapies & in the esteem with which Freud's ideas are held. This changing perception of Freud & psychoanalysis among the Me is traced in the popular print media from the 1950s to the present, & is attributed to the fact that the Freudian perspective had only a superficial affinity with US individualism, exemplified by the tradition of self-reliance & the belief that the self can be changed by acts of willpower. Between the 1950s & the 1980s, more culturally resonant therapies increasingly pushed psychoanalysis out of its prior dominance in the therapy market. Despite the fact that all these therapies owe some basic premises to Freud, his image has gone from being deified in the 1950s, to being ignored in the 1960s, to being demystified in the 1970s, & finally, to being vilified in the 1980s.

These theses are developed with consideration of theories on society, culture, & organization, particularly those of Max Weber, Niklas Luhmann, Klaus Eder, & Emile Durkheim. Schluskel, Yvette R., Pickering, Thomas P. & Schnall, Peter L. (Hypertension Center Cornell Medical Center, 525 East 68th New York NY 10021), Structural vs Subjective Predictors of Role Strain in Organizations.

An examination of how increases in blood pressure, a known risk factor for cardiovascular disease, measured as a response to stress during work & nonwork hours, could reflect the effects of work environments on employees in large, diverse organizations. Ambulatory blood pressure recordings were made during 24 hours for 38 mild hypertensives & 76 normotensive Ms who were chosen from a screened population of 3,300 workers at 4 New York City organizations: a federal health agency, a stock brokerage, a beverage distiller, & a private hospital. Their perceptions of their work environment were assessed by the Organizational Environment Questionnaire, which measures physical, organizational, & interpersonal aspects of jobs on 55 multiple-choice & open-ended items. Data analyzed for the hypertensives & normals shows that higher diastolic pressure during the workday than at home was associated with working in large groups or in physically demanding jobs & with high co-worker support. Higher average systolic pressures at work were related to using information from multiple sources on the job, being a supervisor, & putting in overtime. The effect of working in a large department & having supervisory status raised work vs home systolic pressure even after demographic factors (education & age) were controlled. However, subjective perceptions of the work environment had no significant effect on blood pressure in a multivariate model that controlled for organizational & occupational variables. This finding suggests that such structural variables (especially administrative hierarchy & size) may be better predictors of objective indicators of job stress than subjective perceptions of workers in large, diverse organizations.

Traditional analyses of improving software design usually conclude noting the lack of end-user involvement in the development & phases & by recommending that user involvement receive greater emphasis. Here, it is suggested that there are structural barriers that strain software companies from increasing their emphasis on end-user involvement, & that there are limitations to the extent to which end users are able to meaningfully contribute to the development & design process. It is suggested that software design is not just the result of inter-value choices that reflect managerial objectives rather than user (ie the process is more dynamic than just the reflection of work power relations as some analyses might suggest). Rather, the structural aspects of the software design process that influence values are considered in design choices. This process constrains the consideration, even the recognition, of a broader range of value choices those involved in the design process.

- Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 10 pp.
- ¶ Recent developments in US health care policy can be fruitfully analyzed as reflecting a new form of the US welfare state. The changing state intervention that began to take place in the early 1980s is indicative of this evolution. Earlier types of intervention in health policy were characterized by the reluctance of the US to adopt measures that tipped the playing balance of state/society relations. Examples include the open financing of Medicare & the closed-system care of Medicaid. The introduction of Diagnostic Related Groups (DRGs) in mental health care illustrates a new & more interventionist role of the state. Despite the goal of limiting the extent of public sector involvement, & even though direct provision by the state has not increased, the state is now in fact engaged in micromanagement of the substance & delivery of health & mental health care. The paradox of liberal interventionism describes the process of transformation in state intervention.

Shepelak, Norma J. & De Peters, Marcella (Dept Sociology Wright State U, Dayton OH 45435). Inequality, Legitimation and Just Deserts.

An examination of how beliefs about the opportunity structure in U.S. society organize the way people think about inequality, & in turn shape their evaluations about the just distribution of wealth. According to the model, individuals will perceive inequality as legitimate to the extent that they accept principles of meritocracy & equal opportunity. Using survey data ($N = 328$), it is found that beliefs about meritocracy & opportunity are uniformly held by women & men, & blacks & whites. Perceptions of inequality, however, are perceived differently by racial & gender groups, with whites & men perceiving less poverty than blacks & women. While beliefs in meritocracy & opportunity slightly influence perceptions of inequality & its legitimacy, people with less formal education, younger people & blacks are more likely to question the legitimacy of inequality.

Shin, Eui Hang (Dept Sociology U South Carolina, Columbia 29208). Marriages of the Business Elite Families in Korea: Homogeneity or Marriage of Convenience?

Published biographical data on top executives of chaebol groups in Korea are used to document the extent of interlocking ties between families who own business conglomerates, as well as between business & elite political families through marriages of their sons. The essence of the chaebol's matrimonial policy is the conviction that marital unions should consolidate family ties & strengthen the financial & political standing of the family through formation of advantageous alliances with other influential families. Such value orientations have generated unique status cultures of the chaebol groups with regard to the norms & processes of marriage. For the chaebol families, marriage is more a union between the families involved than a coupling of the individuals concerned, & almost all marriages of these families are arranged by a go-between who has detailed knowledge concerning the financial, political, & social backgrounds of both families. Since trust & loyalty are the most desired credentials that a potential executive can offer, owners of the chaebol groups employ a substantial number of their in-laws for top executive positions in order to maximize the exploitation of such strong ascriptive ties. In establishing marital ties, the chaebol families tend to select families of influential politicians & bureaucrats. The observed patterns of marital relationships of the chaebol families reveal strong evidence of the marriage of convenience & of marital ties based on the exchange notion.

Understanding where housing finance flows helps to explain the direction of neighborhood change, metropolitan expansion, central city deterioration, revitalization, & ghetto maintenance. Knowing where credit flows & why is also necessary information for policymakers & community organizations to work with housing finance providers to eliminate market barriers to credit & to promote more responsible community reinvestment behavior. Based on a series of studies conducted on the Chicago, Ill., Washington, DC, & Baltimore, Md, MSAs, methods & measurement techniques used to determine housing credit flows among neighborhoods within metropolitan areas are presented. After examining the theoretical & applied foundations for this work, data availability, strengths, & limitations are explored, & potential criteria to be used to define metropolitan lending submarkets are laid out, with emphasis on gentrifying submarkets within cities. Multivariate & other statistical techniques used to examine credit flow disparities & market segmentation are explained, focusing on standardized measures, measures of racial change, & issues of model specification. Finally, techniques that can be used to evaluate the community reinvestment performance of individual financial institutions are presented.

¶ How do medical students learn to get rid of the inappropriate feelings they initially have toward patients & certain medical procedures? Two years of participant observation in a medical school revealed that the subject of emotion management is taboo & remains part of the hidden curriculum. Yet the faculty, curriculum, & organization of medical school provide students with resources for dealing with emotional problems. The culture of medicine that informs textbook & teaching knowledge & includes formal rules for dealing with emotional responses of patients & procedures allows the students to draw on aspects of their experiences in medical school to manage their emotions. Their strategies include transforming the patient into an intellectualized object that "gets rid of the person," accentuating the comfortable feelings that occur, blaming the patient for the discomfort, laughing it off, & avoiding contact that provokes discomfort. Students must also deal with the problem of bringing the medical perspective home to their family & friends.

¶ A report on a quantitative network analysis of international commodity trade flows designed to measure the structure of the world economic system & to identify the roles that particular countries play in the global DofI. It improves on earlier network-analytic studies that used block-modeling by employing a newly developed measure of regular equivalence & by examining international trade networks at more than one point in time (1965, 1970, & 1980). Through analysis of UN statistics, questions about change in the overall structure of the world economy & about the positions of particular countries in the system are answered. The findings conform to the theoretical expectations of the world-system perspective as well as qualitative descriptions of recent changes in the international DofI. They also reveal a relatively stable pattern with a well-defined core & periphery & evidence of multiple differentiable semiperipheries. The three snapshots of the structure over the fifteen-year period suggest a trend toward clearer definition of the system as a linear structure & rise of a more multicentric competitive core. In terms of national "mobility," the analysis detects some interesting changes in the core & is sensitive to dependent development in the semiperiphery.

¶ To sharpen classical conceptions of party alignments in the US, the effects of occupational class, SES, & ethnicity on voting alignments in the 1984 presidential election are examined. The ethnic groups analyzed are white Protestants, white Catholics, white Jews, & Afro-Americans (blacks). To provide a comparative baseline, Alford's data on the Ike Eisenhower-Adlai Stevenson election of 1952 are quantified. A major change between 1952 & 1984 is the weakening of ties between white Catholics & the Democratic party. Different group interests explain why Catholics can now be mobilized to vote Republican, & why blacks & Jews continue to vote Democratic.

¶ Idealizing & mirroring transferences, as discussed in modern psychoanalytic theory, play an important part in the development of personal relationships, most obviously those involving love. Here, the effects of such transference patterns on social exchange are examined, & predictions about the dynamic properties of relationships & interaction are offered. In particular, damped cycles of fusion & differentiation in the normal course of a relationship's development are isolated. Also, it is described how aggression appears as a "disintegration product," operating in conjunction with negative transferences to terminate relationships troubled by disintegration anxieties. The psychoanalytic side of this argument resembles attachment theory in its postulation of replicating structures of the self that derive from infancy & influence all subsequent Historical & cross-national data reveal that transaction cost economics does have utility in explaining the behavior of trade associations. Findings also suggest that (1) the exclusive focus on the transaction as the base unit of analysis should be abandoned, (2) the emergence of governance forms should not be assumed to be driven primarily by an interest in economizing on transaction costs, (3) the conditions that render interdependence problematic & prompt actors to turn to nonmarket governance forms should be examined, (4) it cannot be assumed that competitive pressures will determine the long-run distribution of governance forms, & (5) the emergence & development of trade associations in their larger social & political context must be systematically analyzed, particularly the role of the state in shaping their behavior.

One can detect a regression in the projected image from that which the original astronauts built around themselves to that constructed around Christa McAuliffe, ie, the "teacher in space." The first represents the American attaining immortality through competence, the second, characterized by narcissistic thought processes, represents the American as a participant in "Disneyland in space." The capacity to manage technological achievement is present in the former & absent in the latter, in which the concept of technology is replaced by the concept of magic.

¶ At the level of the electorate, the 1984 election was polarized by race, but only mildly polarized by SC, & hardly at all by gender. Here, examined is the level of internal cohesion of organized interests, & of opposition between them, focusing on how businesses divide, whether environmentalists & women's group form a separate block, their relationship to unions, & the behavior of unions, corporations, & trade associations. These issues are addressed through an analysis of the campaign contributions of all 244 Political Action Committees (PACs) that contributed $100,000+ to Congressional candidates in the 1984 election. Using network grouping methods that make it possible for a PAC to be in no group, 1 group, or many differing groups, PACs are grouped on the basis of similarities in their political strategy. Two very clear groups emerge, one dominated by business & one by labor. Most women's & environmental groups form part of the labor-dominated bloc, many New Right PACs are not part of the business bloc. Only 4 PACs appear in both groups, & only 25 do not appear in either group. Depending on the variables used, a linear probability model can explain 50%-70% of the variance in group membership.

¶ An examination of the shift of South Africa's nonracial, or nonracialist, labor movement into a multiclass political coalition. It is argued that changing conditions in the 1980s, particularly a severe recession, a community-based uprising, forced unionists to abandon a previous emphasis on purely WC factory-based organization, because community alliances became essential to union survival. External conditions & community alliances also pushed the labor movement to stress political issues to workers' problems. The earlier shopfloor focus had strengthened workers' analysis of apartheid as a system of labor control as well as racial domination, as unions built stronger community ties, unions expanded their definition of the WC beyond the shopfloor. It is argued that rather than diluting WC interests by joining a populist broad-based unionists may have succeeded in using community alliances to strengthen support for WC demands.

¶ Data from the 1974 Israeli Mobility Survey are used to examine hypotheses derived from the credentialism & industrialization theories. (1) the effects of social background are greater on the transitions into higher education than on the transitions involving schooling, & (2) social background effects on educational transitions decline across cohorts. The results fail to reveal a consistent historical pattern in the effects of father's education & father's occupation on any educational transitions. However, the effect of ethnicity on the transition from primary school & on entry into secondary education seems to decline in the most recent cohort, though its effect on high school completion rises monotonically across all cohorts compared. It is concluded that primary & some postprimary education became nearly universal, threshold of social exclusion moved up to high school completion, the ethnic differentials continued to rise.

More than any other such restaurant, McDonald's exemplifies the new dining experience in contrast to previous forms of public & private dining. It is suggested that McDonald's is participating in remaking the ritual of dining as postmodern experience, in which certain traditional US themes (eg, individuality & conformity) are reinterpreted as part of the total consumer experience at McDonald's. These consumer images are the key to McDonald's hegemony within the market. What could be described as pieces of interaction (eg, waiting in line, placing the order, reading the menu, & eating the meal) are read as a text or semiotically within the context of the restaurant.

The relationship between gender & political thinking/behavior has emerged as an important issue in recent years. Research restricted to consideration of sex differences is expanded here to look at the degree to which observed sex differences can be attributed to gender as a social process that fosters differential control over reproduction & production. ISREI is used to analyze national telephone survey data ($N = 1,604$) in a model in which six dimensions of political thinking are regressed on measures of sex position in reproduction, production, & cultural relations. On three dimensions economic fairness, strikes, & health/education spending, initial sex differences disappear when controlling for gender, SC, & cultural location. Sex differences in support for traditional gender roles & in tendencies to "blame poor" are increased, & those in military spending are unaffected by controlling for gender, SC, & culture. Interpretations are offered for these outcomes in terms of material interests & the context of material experience.

Stallings, Teresa G. & Zev-Ferrell, Mary (Sociology Dept Texas A&M U, College Station 77840), Faculty Compliance in a Large Research University.

To examine Amitai Etzioni's (1975) idea of compliance, questionnaire ($N = 720$ faculty) & interview (all department heads) data collected in large research U are used to discern the basis of control of faculty in U: remunerative, normative, or mixed. Etzioni has proposed that the U is a normative organization characterized by normative control & by moral committed involvement. He also postulates that any significant remunerative control will serve to neutralize normative control, conjecturing that the application of remunerative powers makes appeal to normative (idealistic) motives less salient. Analyzing the survey, interview, & institutional data, a logit model demonstrates that individuals not normatively committed to the U organization tend not to comply with the administration's preferences in terms of workstyle (emphasis on research, teaching & services), committed personnel comply fully, & those somewhat committed comply "somewhat." These results imply that a power-involvement structure of the U is congruent, with both power involvement being normatively based. Calculative involvement is not salient when considered alone, but in interaction with moral involvement, the lowest salary levels, it seems to neutralize the effectiveness of moral involvement, thereby becoming the predominant force in compliance. Thus, faculty with the lowest salaries are more likely to comply fully, even when normative orientation is absent. Etzioni's concept of dual compliance structure offers an explanation of this reversal of faculty orientation.

Structural factors such as industry & local labor market characteristics are hypothesized to affect black employment by providing whites & blacks with different institutional resources & opportunities in competition for jobs. Analysis of government statistics indicates that within the manufacturing sector of the 49 largest SMSAs in 1982, economic growth as well as characteristics of establishments (size & racial homogeneity), industries (wages), & local labor markets (% black, % unionized, local manufacturing wages, & residential segregation) influence the % of black Ms employed in 3 occupational groups: managers & professionals, technicians & craftspersons (skilled production workers), & operatives, laborers, & service workers (semi-/unskilled workers). The % of white workers is the strongest predictor of the % of black M managers/professionals. Industry growth is negatively associated with the % of black M skilled production workers, while growth in the manufacturing sector of the SMSA is negatively associated with the % of black Ms in all 3 occupational groups. Also, local labor market variables are more important than industry variables in determining the % of black Ms employed in manufacturing jobs.

Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 20 pp.

Until the 1920s adults demonstrated little awareness of jealousy among young children. However, a rising tide of attention developed from about 1925 onward, as childrearing manuals routinely delivered dire & lengthy warnings about sibling rivalry & parents began to note the issue as one of their most pressing worries. The problem was defined both as a challenge in families with young children, where physical injury as well as lasting unpleasantness might result from uncurbed jealousy, & as a problem for the adult personality if jealousy were allowed to fester. Various strategies were recommended to minimize tension & to reassure love, jealousy of a sibling was to be accepted but talked out, subtly labeled as childish. The reasons for this substantial shift in the rules about jealousy include changing family size, which heightened actual sibling rivalry over previous levels; expert reassessments of early childhood, & a growing desire to produce smooth, conflict-free personalities as part of a more managerial, service-oriented economy. While the intensity of concern about sibling rivalry abated slightly by the 1960s, the basic rules remained in place, the new tone constituted an internalization of the earlier rules & tactics. Finally, the impact of the new structures on sibling jealousy can be traced in several areas: a real change in emotional relations among siblings, as children bonded together less; new emotional tensions in family life that could alter wider parental perceptions of children, a growing desire among adults to shun jealousy as a childish emotion though often an inability fully to do so. The change in the twentieth-century pattern of jealousy deserves serious attention as part of the new complexities & repressive requirements of US emotional life.

The results indicate that Communist led unions were distinct in their pursuits & achievements. Most importantly, they were more successful in signing contracts that maximized workers' shop floor control.

Strawser, Hermann & Schlegel, Guenther (Dept Sociology U Duisburg, D-4100 1 Federal Republic Germany), "Gemeinschaft or Gesellschaft? Two Competing Visions of Society in Werner Stark's and Max Weber's Sociology of Religion".

A comparison of the sociology of religion of Max Weber with that of Werner Stark (The Social Bond, Vol IV, New York: Fordham U, 1983), who died in 1985. It is assumed that all social theories imply not just value relations but also value positions. Careful analysis reveals Weber's value-induced "vision of society" & Stark's "vision of community." Both Weber & Stark base their respective analyses of the specific manifestations of Christendom on a spatially, temporarily, & life-worldly contingent apologetic. However, the alleged commonality in the subject matter is deceptive. Weber explains the end of religion in rational-idealistic terms, i.e., by means of the religious ethic of Protestantism itself. He assumes that the overcoming of the principle of irrationalism (i.e., religious belief) produces the isolation of the individual, the separation of man from mythological reasoning, & the Vergesellschaftung of the human world by means of formal contracts. At the end of this development, Weber sees the bureaucratic state securing its authority by way of rational use of technology. Stark opposes such a rigid rationalism & its implied consequences. He transcribes Weber's assumptions into a theory of belief & hence justifies the necessity of the principle of irrationality for human reasoning. This central assertion of his sociology of religion is based on the general assumption that, though there are different structures & perspectives in different societies, the problem of integration or sociality, i.e., the control of centrifugal forces by centripetal institutions & ideas is part & parcel of all societies. Stark sees such a syncretical force inherent in Catholicism. For Stark, religion not only represents "opium for the people" or an irrational, ideological guide to action, but also serves as a functional equivalent to other (than scientific) methods of system stabilization.

relationships, however, the approach differs from attachment theory in significant respects, eg, in the use it makes of a bipolar conception of the self to derive the cyclical trajectory observable in the early stages of relationships. The social exchange side of the argument departs from a criticism of existing exchange theory's inability to account for the particularism of the personal tie, most notably the reluctance of significant others to regard one another merely in the light of market evaluations, as claimed, eg, by Peter Blau (Exchange and Power in Social Life, see SA 132/65B4829). Coupling notions of transference to the process of mutual evaluation permits an analysis of social exchange apart from market considerations & in full view of relevant personal needs.

¶ The progress of black & white women in the professions between 1960 & 1980 is examined in comparison to the experiences of the dominant group of white men in the professions, in addition, racial segregation in the professions is analyzed by comparing the progress of black & white women. Using detailed occupational census data made comparable across years, it is found that despite the tremendous inequality that persists in 1980, there has been some movement toward equality for both black & white women in relation to white men throughout the professional hierarchy. However, this movement is most apparent in the neutral (or non-sex segregated) professions for black women, white women were already equal to white men in the neutral professions in 1960 & remain so in 1980. Except for the neutral professions, white women show greater movement toward equality with white men than do black women throughout the professional hierarchy during this period. Also, within the low-status, F-dominated professions, white men show a significant decline in their underrepresentation relative to both black & white women. In sharp contrast, in the high-status, M-dominated professions, both black & white women show little movement away from their severely high levels of underrepresentation, with black women worse off than white women.

¶ The transformation of largely peasant nations into Ur industrial ties has been the most dramatic change to take place in Eastern E since the creation of the people's democracies following WWII, the been scant systematic analysis of the collectivization of agriculture. Methods of comparative sociology are used to compare the collectivization process in Poland & Hungary, 1948-1958, since these two n faced similar crises in 1956 that left the issue of collectivization o culture in doubt. The aim is to test hypotheses on the relationship between the state & the peasantry in an industrializing society through prism of the Eastern European experience. Attention is drawn to th of collectivization as an element in the class struggle designed to socialism to the countryside, a means by which the state could gain control over economic resources, & a mechanism to eliminate political sition to the consolidation of the new regimes. Based on the differ sults in Hungary & Poland, it is argued that collectivization can b understood as an element in state formation for the new regime: state's actions were taken within a wider framework in which poli tions were constrained by dependence on the USSR & the econom mands of an industrializing society. The peasantry, economically litically peripheral to regime concerns, could not determine the f collectivization, though it could extract concessions from the state.

¶ An investigation of transitions out of first jobs for a 1958 birth c of 12,000 British Ms & Fs, based on multiple event histories throug 23. The analyses focus on how first jobs serve as ports-of-entry to markets & career lines, first job as a signal event in the transiti adulthood, & gender differences in duration of, & causes of vari in, transitions from first job. In particular, the analyses consider tinuities in types of position systems (ie, open vs closed) across educ & work domains. One version of this hypothesis is investigated by c ining whether education tracks (ie, ability & school type) generat jobs of differing duration, or in open vs closed work position systems methodology features a continuous-time, discrete-state stochastic t qualitative analysis, eg. the BYU Concordance program, the Ethnograph, Qualpro, & Text Analysis Packet. Neither the types of qualitative research nor the various software packages are "pure" & discrete enough to establish a simple one-to-one match between a type of research and a software package. However, there are correspondences between each of the poles of the three analysis dimensions distinguished & certain software capabilities; these correspondences are described to provide guidance for the qualitative researcher's choice of appropriate software.

In addition to conducting a selective but critical review of the literature on women's role in migration & identifying evidence of changes in social position associated with geographic mobility, an attempt is made to identify the methodological & conceptual issues that bear on assessments of women's social position changes in the course of migration. A comparison of findings from research using individual women vs families as analytical units is instructive for this exercise. Finally, evidence generated from case studies in Africa & Latin America is drawn on to make inferences about the way culture, SC, & economic change impact on gender stratification systems.

Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 31 pp. Sociologists have neglected their opportunity & responsibility to examine the rise of military power in the contemporary world. In European experience since about 1500, political processes accompanying the rise of war & military power generally diminished the autonomous power of military men; since 1945, especially in the Third World, that has reversed. Three possible explanations: failure of civilian institutions to exert external support, & minimization of negotiation between state & civil society remain plausible in the present state of knowledge. Sociologists should pursue the inquiry.

Two hypotheses of the effects of minority group size on intergroup relations are tested. (1) the tokenism hypothesis suggests that discrimination against a minority group increases when the group is relatively small & the competition hypothesis suggests the opposite: that discrimination decreases as minority group size increases. An analysis of the determinants of changes in the number of F faculty in academic departments over a nine-year period provides support for the second hypothesis. However, the effects of competition are shown to be mediated by the distribution of F's in the departmental hierarchy. Implications for further research are discussed.

Tomaskovic-Devey, Donald (North Carolina State U Raleigh 27650), Economic Changes and Poverty, 1959-1979

An exploration of changes in US poverty as a function of local industrial structure, labor market structure, & income transfers. Research focusing on ecological variation in inequality has suggested that industrial structure & labor market structure are central determinants of the variation in income across ecological units. With all US counties as the units of analysis, & using lagged dependent variable panel models, the effects of industrial structure, labor market structure, & transfer payments on changes in poverty between 1959 & 1979 are examined. The analysis supports the contention that industrial structure & labor market organization have important effects, that of transfer payments is more marginal, particularly during the 1970s. Antipoverty programs, it is argued, should focus primarily on the quality of available jobs in a locality, & secondarily on income redistribution through transfer payments. When transfer payments are necessary, they should be high enough (eg, social security) to actually lift people out of poverty.

Tomaskovic-Devey, Donald & Risman, Barbara J. (North Carolina State U, Raleigh 27650), Organizational, Managerial, and Employee Constraints on the Technological Reorganization of Work: The Case of Telecommuting

In an exploration of organizational, managerial, & employee constraints on the reorganization of the work process, focus is on the rationales of top decisionmakers in a sample of firms (N = 114) for adopting & designing telecommuting jobs. Telecommuting employees working from home using computer technology represents a radical reorganization of the labor process, made possible by recent technological innovations. It is found that the organization of telecommuting work is fundamentally conditioned by the relative power & status of the target employee group. In general, high-skill, high-status professional telecommuting jobs will be designed in a way to enhance employee productivity, satisfaction, & retention. Low-skill, low-status clerical telecommuting jobs will be designed to lower labor costs, with disregard for issues of employee morale. Fears of loss of managerial control decrease the probability of clerical telecommuting options & actually increase the likelihood of professional telecommuting.

The nineteenth century Swedish mining community of Ytterby figures prominently in the future of US scientific & industrial enterprise, because it produced the first rare-earth minerals, products that could result in huge savings in energy. A brief history is given, from the environmental effects perspective, of mining at Ytterby, along with a statement of modern environmental lessons learned from effects assessment in the US & on the US outer continental shelf (OCS). Speculations are offered as to what effects might occur from similar development on the Alaskan OCS.

The problem of interpreting municipal change during the Progressive era is addressed. Many changes appear contradictory or paradoxical, eg when formal democracy was extended & contracted, the market copied & challenged, municipal administration centralized & decentralized. The Weberian approach to the development of rational capitalism, particularly its emphasis on calculability in law & administration, is used to argue the underlying logic of social change. Transformations in contract law, home rule, proprietary actions, municipal administration, formal democracy, the use of experts, & the destruction of Ul bosses are used to suggest a general development consonant with that of rational capitalism.

¶ All elections for which Federal Election Commission data are available from 1978 to 1986 are analyzed with regard to corporate political groupings, based on network methods & using the campaign contributions of political action committees (PACs) as data. The sample includes the largest PACs for each election, sufficient to account for 60% of all corporate PAC money donated in that election. A PAC that qualifies for any one election is analyzed for all years ($N = 309$ PACs, though not all PACs existed in all years). 1980 turns out to be an unusual year. In no other year were corporations so unified in a conservative bloc to the exclusion of other groupings. Preliminary analysis indicates that conservatism was the primary basis for bloc formation in each year, but other bases also exist in some years (eg, a Tex regional group).

¶ An attempt to locate a common ground between the institutional & ecological approaches to organizational theory, which traditionally have disagreed over the role of hierarchy & coercion in organizational evolution, possibility of organizational change, & extent to which organizations create their own environments. Addressing ambiguities in the prevailing theoretical formulations, as reflected in these disputes, it is concluded that an adjudication of the conflict between population ecology & institutional theory is both feasible & desirable. In particular, an examination of these approaches' convergence on a new level of analysis suggests that an integration of the two may yield important insights into the historical development of new organizational fields. As a first step toward such an integration, the interconnection of material & ideal factors in organizational life is examined, suggesting that organizational environments reflect a coevolution of resource & information flows.

Sullivan, Gerard (Dept Sociology U Hawaii, Honolulu 96822). A Study of Political Campaigns of Discrimination against Gay People in the United States 1950-1978.

¶ An examination of eight campaigns of discrimination against gay people in the US between 1950 & 1978. The cases were selected for variation in geographic region, historical period, & level of government involved. The effect on the gay community & response it made to the campaigns are discussed, along with the ideology about gay people developed in each campaign, & the factors that led to the onset, escalation, & eventual decline of each campaign. Important influences affecting the character of antigay discriminatory campaigns are the development of a gay community & gay liberation ideology. In 1950 there was no organized opposition to "gay bashing," & prejudice toward homosexuals became widespread, campaigns in this period were partly a reaction to the newly observable presence of gay people. In the 1970s the gay rights movement won numerous concessions. Several campaigns presented homosexuals in very negative terms, but met with strong opposition from the gay community. Although the campaigns had negative effects on the lives of many gay people & public attitudes toward them, they also stimulated the development of the gay rights movement. By 1978 PO had changed from uncritical support of these campaigns to a position where discrimination against homosexuals was not favored, though antidiscrimination policies protecting gay people were not endorsed.

Sutton, John R. (Dept Sociology U California, Santa Barbara 93106). The Enduring Asylum: Expansion of Mental Hospital Populations in Progressive America.

¶ An analysis of the growth of inmate populations in mental institutions across the US over the period 1880-1923, with focus on Grob's argument that pressures for reform in the care of the insane were undercut by the US' persistent inability to deal with the problem of poverty, ie, as antiquated almshouses were gradually shut down, mental institutions were forced to absorb many of the most difficult cases of dependency. Thus throughout this period asylum populations grew larger, & were increasingly dominated by the aged poor. Dynamic pooled time-series cross-section methods are used to test three hypotheses. (1) general societal complexity-measured in terms of urbanization rates-increased the incidence of mental disorders, & hence contributed to the expansion of institutions, (2) government wealth measured in terms of state government revenues placed a ceiling on the capacity for building institutions, patronage politics measured in terms of interparty competition-to inhibit public investments in institutions. Results suggest that in the population of the institutionalized insane was driven by a combination of factors, including broad population dynamics, the extract capacity of government, & the strength of extragovernmental party organization. Findings lend strong support to Grob's argument about the anticipated consequences of almshouse reform even when other important causal influences are controlled, it appears that the spillover population of the dependent poor encouraged continued dependence on institutions. This conclusion points to the historical linkage between poverty & forms of deviance, & underscores the importance of placing special control reforms in the wider context of the US welfare state.

Sutton, John R., Wuthnow, Robert & Liebman, Robert C. (Dept Sociology U California, Santa Barbara 93106). Organizational Linkages: Schisms in American Protestant Denominations, 1890-19

¶ An examination of the founding of US mainline Protestant denominations as this occurs through a process of schism from preexisting denominations. The joint effects of internal organizational characteristics, environmental factors on rates of schism are examined using dyadic event history models, focusing on the effects of centralization, & linkages to interorganizational federations, as well as density dependent & environmental turbulence. Findings indicate that membership in a federal federation & size continue to have powerful effects on rates of schism, even when environmental factors are controlled. Further, a number of significant environmental effects are found. Density effects are apparent in that the greater the number of existing denominations, the higher the rate of schism. Environmental turbulence, whether measured in terms of unemployment or business failure rates, encourages schism. Some speculations are offered on how these results might be generalizable to other organizational forms eg, political parties & movements in which foundings are likely to occur through process of insurgency & organizational breakdown.

¶ An analysis of the response of the Reform & Conservative movements in Israel to their slow growth in membership, & to the antagonism which they must contend on a political level. While the leaders of these movements present their movements as alternatives to Orthodox Judaism, their struggle for recognition often brings them into conflict with the Orthodox establishment. They are joined in this struggle by individuals & organizations opposed to any degree of intertwining between religion & state in Israel. By focusing on Orthodox Judaism in Israel as manifest by the Orthodox establishment as their counterrole model, ie, the model that serves as their backdrop or framework for defining & demarcating their identity, they come to be seen as antireligious movements. This has a deleterious impact on their ability to attract persons interested in a religious alternative to Orthodox Judaism.

 • exploration of the identities of Cuban Jewish women who immigrated to the U.S. in 1960-1962, after the Castro Revolution, based on in-depth interviews with 12 Ashkenazi & 8 Sephardic women in the greater Miami area, where an estimated 85% of Cuban Jews in the U.S. are still living. The women range in age from 30 to 74 now, at the time of arrival they were representatives of three life stages: (1) children, (2) teens, early 20s, & (3) mature adults who came with husbands & children. Informant interviews with 5 Cuban Jewish men & 2 non-Cuban Jewish academic women were also conducted. Reference group interviews were found useful in analyzing the attitudes & behavior of Cuban Jewish women, almost all of them identify themselves as Cuban Jewish (i.e., or Jewish) who are also U.S. citizens with their Jewish identity being strongest & the Cuban identity a close second. Age at arrival in the U.S., strong family values & control, persistence of enclave in ethnic enclaves, & their lifestyle in pre-Castro Cuba were the variables found to determine their identities.

 • Georg Simmel's cultural theory, which reaches its culmination in "The Stranger in Modern Culture" (in Levine, Donald N. [Ed.] Georg Simmel: Individuality and Social Forms, Chicago: U. of Chicago Press, 1971) is the most comprehensive mediation that he was able to achieve in his many intellectual endeavors. In particular, cultural theory & cultural history mediate between Simmel's sociological theory & his general philosophical inquiries. Using his sociological essay "The Stranger and Mental Life" (in Wolff, Kurt H. [Ed.] The Sociology of Georg Simmel [see SA 14 3/66B9998]) & his discussion of philosophical anthropology in Schopenhauer and Nietzsche (see IRPS No. 39, 1976) to illuminate the polar perspectives of his thought, one finds Simmel presents accounts of consciousness as dependent upon objective cultural development in his sociology & accounts of consciousness as arising from a self-initiating center in his philosophy. His cultural theory mediates between these polar perspectives by conceiving of life as a creative activity, embracing both the personal & the impersonal (i.e., objective) dimensions. In addition, the mature cultural theory marks a departure from a more passive view of consciousness to a more active placing Simmel closer to the existential phenomenologies that succeeded the vitalistic movements in European thought.

In light of the boundary

dialectic, the metropolis becomes, for Simmel, a symbol of the failed mediations attempted in modernity between the objective culture of things & the subjective culture of personal development.

 • A discussion of the practical implications of previous studies that have revealed identifiable differences between the value systems of prison inmates & the general population (Welch, Michael, "The Value Systems of Incarcerated Embezzlers Compared to Other Inmates and the General Population" unpublished PhD dissertation, North Texas State U, Denton, 1987; & Cochrane, R., "The Structure of Value Systems in Male and Female Prisons" [see SA 20 5/7216911]). These findings suggest a link between an individual's value system & a criminal lifestyle. The implications of value systems research are based on the body of literature which argues that value systems are capable of being changed if confronted situationally. One strategy intended to assist in the adjustment of a person's value system is value clarification. How value systems research relates to value clarification is demonstrated, & an intervention model is presented for sociological practice in prisons.

 • Previous research finding deprivation to be associated with high levels of political violence is questioned because of the macrolevel data often used in these investigations. Concentration on the development of one organization engaged in political violence, the Irish Republican Army (IRA), shows that deprivation in the form of unemployment was not the cause of IRA violence. State repression, however, positively influenced levels of IRA violence. Data from intensive interviews conducted in 1984/85 with 18 IRA supporters & non-supporters allow an interpretation of this finding, & show that state repression led political activists to consider the political options available to them, i.e., violent vs nonviolent protest, & to choose one or the other. This is consistent with mobilization & political process explanations of participation in political violence, & is the finding that unemployment does not lead to increased violence, is inconsistent with deprivation explanations of collective behavior.

¶ An examination of recent trends in physical health of older US adults, their contemporary health profile, & health prospects for future cohorts of older people. Though longevity has increased remarkably in the past twenty years, health statistics suggest an increasing burden of poor health & disability in late life. Turning to contemporary health, it is noted that older people's leading health problem, arthritis, is often overlooked in public health research & policy, & preference given to fatal conditions instead. Yet arthritis is the principal cause of daily discomfort & dominant reason for social limitations, especially for older women. To make reasonable forecasts about future health, scientists are developing models that link morbidity, disability, & mortality; these models are reviewed. A likely scenario for the future is that older people will be just as likely (as at present) to acquire diseases over their longer lifetimes, but disease onset may be later & its impact less severe. This shift toward mildness will mean a more comfortable & functional life for individuals.

¶ More than 75 incidents of mass protests against austerity policies occurred around the world since 1976. These protests have taken many forms, from mass demonstrations to organized strikes & riots. In each case they were directed against internationally fashionable transmitted austerity programs implemented by national governments in response to debt problems. Examined here are (1) the different types of debtor countries that have experienced these protests & (2) variation among protest countries in the nature of the protests. Possible explanatory variables are examined, & hypotheses presented, drawn mostly from world-systems/dependent resource mobilization theories. The results of the two main analyses show that the principal conditions for the occurrence & intensity of austerity protests are overurbanization & the degree of involvement of international agencies in domestic political-economic policy.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service pre $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper

¶ The contention of Hans Gerth & C. Wright Mills that "Mead's adequate theory of emotion" (Character and Social Structure) is refuted. A synoptic review of George Herbert Mead's elaboration of John Dewey's functional psychology of emotion is presented, drawing on Mead's turn-of-the-century publications & notes from his 1914 lecture in social psychology. Mead extended Dewey's initial insight into the physiological correlates of emotional experience concordant with modern research on the physiology of emotion, provided a hypothesis for the pragmatic contention that the immediate quality of social life is affective, rooted in the production of emotions in interaction, & emotion to the broader social structure through the mediation of acts in the construction of acts.

Hollars, Cheryl & Skocpol, Theda (Dept Sociology Harvard U, Cambridge MA 02138). The Selling of Social Security: The Creation of a Political Culture.

An examination of early Social Security administrators' attempts to create a supportive political climate for their institutionalization of a new system of social provision for the aged: social insurance & old age assistance. Neither the Social Security Act's dual system of old age programs nor current policy debates can be fully understood without examining the original policymakers' intentions & their attempts to influence public opinion over time by constructing a supportive symbolic imagery for their program. Historians, objecting to "social control" interpretations of welfare policies, & a few sociologists have criticized the dominant institutional approach to welfare history for overemphasizing the intent of elites, ignoring the role of PO in shaping policy outcomes. Yet institutional analysis does not necessarily preclude historical explanations of the complex relation between policy demands & supply. Social Security administrators were influenced by articulated demands & previous policy decisions & still had an important latitude of choice in their policy decisions. An original content analysis is presented of the political language in the sophisticated persuasion campaign that early administrators conducted in various media from the 1930s through the 1950s. Social Security policymakers attempted thereby to gain the legitimacy necessary, in the short run, for acceptance of their compromise between conflicting policy goals & institutional constraints, & (2) in the long run, to promote the continuance of their vision, while limiting the terrain of future policy battles over Social Security.

Zukin, Sharon (Dept Sociology Graduate Center City U New York, NY 10036). The Postmodern Debate over Urban Form.

* Instead of applying without question a category derived from visual culture, sociologists must alter their understanding of postmodernism so that it reflects a social process. If this is understood as postmodernization, it suggests parallels as well as discontinuities with the social & cultural transformations of the late nineteenth century. At present, postmodernization suggests changes in both the patronage & polarities of cultural forms, shifts that have affected the Ur landscape by altering the balance between market & place. An empirical discussion of Ur form in the US in the twentieth century traces the implications of three different cases for an understanding of postmodernization: (1) The present expansion & reproduction of high-rent Ur space & its permeation by multinational firms producing cultural goods have encouraged a new international DoIt among cultural producers, reflected in internationalization & standardization of architectural type. (2) Symbiosis of forms & functions between art museums & department stores, since 1900, has created a liminal space between market & place that represents a hallmark of Ur form. (3) Contemporary architecture, commonly understood to represent new, postmodern form, is shown to have been constructed & described in earlier periods. In this sense, Fredric Jameson's description of the Bonaventure Hotel in Los Angeles, Calif, is anticipated by Henry James's depiction of the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City in 1905. The conclusion is simply caution about making a more precise use of visual categories.

Wienir, Paul L., Barnhardt, Jane & Pepper, Carolyn (Dept Sociology Western Michigan U., Kalamazoo 49008), Equity, Fairness and Power in Intimate Relationships

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 22 pp.

¶ The central role of the exchange process in intimate relationships is explored by (1) comparing the relative impact of power & inequity, (2) exploring the differences between structural inequity & possibly crucial intervening variables of unfairness, & (3) examining the contributions of various presumed psychological reactions to inequity as they relate to relational contentment. Power & inequity in intimate heterosexual dyads were predicted to operate similarly to exchange processes in other relationships: power would increase guilt & contentment, inequity would produce guilt or anger, lower trust, & lead to less contentment. & inequity would be related to, & operate through, a psychological assessment that the relationship was unfair. In a sample of 55 sociology students currently involved in intimate heterosexual dyads, power was assessed using a straightforward rating, inequity by asking for separate ratings of each person's inputs & outcomes, unfairness by 2 measures, & emotional responses by an 8 point scale. Path analysis revealed that both power & inequity led to contentment, but the direct & indirect role of power was stronger. Inequity caused perceptions of unfairness, while unfairness was not causally linked to anger or guilt, but was unexpectedly directly related to trust. Power was inversely related to guilt. Although trust was related to unfairness, anger, & guilt, its questionable placement in the causal model is discussed.

Wiley, Mary Glenn & Crittenden, Kathleen S. (Dept Sociology U. Illinois, Chicago 60680), Masculine, Feminine, Desirable: Current Appraisal of Gender Related Traits.

¶ Recent research on changing gender roles has depended on a few early studies for the specification of masculine & feminine traits & for estimates of the desirability of these traits. Seeking to assess the present ratings of 100 traits on desirability & masculinity/femininity, to investigate the relationship between the desirability & masculinity/femininity of traits, & to test for gender differences in these ratings, 356 Coll students were asked to rate the relative masculinity/femininity of the traits, & an other 351 to rate the same traits on social desirability. Comparing current ratings of desirability & masculinity/femininity with those of previous research, evidence is found of both stability & change. The relative desirability of traits has changed little over two decades, but the negative association between femininity & desirability has reversed, particularly in the eyes of Coll Fs. Similarly, the results support the current validity of previous research on gender role stereotypes, yet Rs viewed the M traits in these conceptualizations as less extremely gender-typed than the F traits. Comparing Ms & Fs in their scalings of the traits shows substantial agreement, but there are reliable gender differences, with each group tending to see its own gender related traits as relatively more desirable.

Williams, Linda B. (IGSB National Center Health Statistics, 3700 East-West Highway Hyattsville MD 20782), Intergenerational Dynamics in the Indonesian Marriage Decision.

¶ Factors that determine how much input Javanese women & men are allowed in decisions regarding their marriages are examined. Perceptions of power & factors that influence them are investigated separately for husbands & wives, using data from a 1985 survey of households in 4 villages in Ru central Java. The dependent variable measures (on a 5 point scale) Rs' perceptions of amount of input in the marriage decisions. It is found that, over time, Rs gained control in decision outcomes, & that fathers' educational levels predicted Rs' decision making power. Also, size of community was important among women, & age at marriage among men.

Windolf, Paul H. (Dept Sociology U. Heidelberg, D-6900 Federal Republic Germany), Deregulation under Corporatist Regimes: Recent Trends in Industrial Relations in Western Europe.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 21 pp.

¶ Corporatism, the tripartite bargaining between unions, employers' associations, & the state, has contributed much to the stability of industrial relations in Western Europe, but in recent years has lost much of its attraction. The new philosophy of deregulation (return to the market) is challenging the traditional highly bureaucratized & centralized bargaining systems. Recent trends of devolution & decentralization in industrial relations are analyzed, concentrating on the weakening of central bargaining systems, loss of union control, participation of workers in general decisions without participation of unions, cooperative alliances between groups of workers & management, & the use of the referendum as a kind of "direct" democracy within the firm. The firm is becoming a new center for industrial relations, & the shift of collective bargaining from the national level to that of the enterprise is weakening corporatism. It is shown that decentralization of collective bargaining is closely tied to changes in technology, the skill structure of the L.F., & market conditions; thus, it will probably survive the economic recession. T studies the introduction of shorter work time in West Germany, forms of participation in the firm in Italy, illustrate the trend toward devolution of corporatist bargaining systems ("meso-corporatism").

Wolf, Diane L. (Dept Sociology U. Washington, Seattle 98195), Her Knows Best about All in the Family: A Feminist Critique of Household Strategies.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 12 pp.

¶ Feminists have exploded the myth of "the family" as a group, voice, united by mutual interests, & argue that there are multiple gendered interests, & unequal distribution of resources. For ideological & practical reasons, the household has replaced the family as the preferred unit of study. It is argued that, particularly in studies of World societies, the myth of the household has replaced that of the family, under the guise of "household strategies," a concept that is used because it can misrepresent intrafamilial behavior & obscure social & cultural differences in intrahousehold gender inequality & stratification. However, if analyzed rather than assumed, household strategies can be a useful tool to open up the household & focus on relationships between genders & generations as they combine culture, with reactions to structural change. On this basis, household strategies in Ru Java (based on primary field data) & Taiwan (based on secondary data) are examined with regard to an important decision affecting family economy: a daughter seeking factory employment. The findings (1) bring into question the automatic assumption of the existence of household strategy, (2) demonstrate cross-cultural differences in household strategy, & (3) show that changes in the new international division of labor be assumed to affect Third World women equally & similarly.

Wu, Lawrence L. & Tuma, Nancy Brandon (Dept Sociology U. Wisconsin, Madison 53706), Local Hazard Models: Models and Methods.

¶ A local hazard model is proposed that incorporates nonproportional hazards effects. Since it maintains parametric assumptions locally rather than globally, it allows investigators to make only mild assumptions about time inhomogeneity (usually age or duration dependence hazard rate). Estimates for this model are obtained using newly developed local likelihood methods, which generalize maximum likelihood estimation by maintaining model assumptions in local neighborhoods of the data. The model is illustrated in analyses of data on age at first marriage. The model has three significant advantages over current models used in event analysis: (1) it allows covariates to exert nonproportional effects because parametric assumptions are maintained locally & not globally; (2) it should be more robust than current models, & (3) parameters controlling time variation are specified in a locally linear fashion, allowing for interpretation.

Yamaguchi, Kazuo (Dept Sociology U. California, Los Angeles 90024), Some Models for the Analysis of Association in Classified Data of One-to-Many Correspondences.

¶ Goodman presented a class of loglinear & log-bilinear models for the analysis of association between two discrete variables having ordered categories. Clogg generalized those models for the analysis of association in multiway cross-classifications. Here, these models are applied to classifications that characterize the correspondence of each subject with multiple objects, where only combinations of the objects, irrespective of order, are distinguished. Using the notion of conditional symmetry, hierarchical loglinear models, log-bilinear association models, & models for such specific cross-classifications are introduced & applied.

disciplines

This is the 43rd number of the new IRPS series. Presented herewith are 30 book abstracts and a listing of 1269 book reviews that appeared in the serials SA abstracted in Volume 36 Number 3.

Book reviews are numbered with a five-digit number with a letter "a" as a prefix, and book abstracts are numbered with a five-digit number and a letter "c" as a prefix.

Each issue has three indexes: a reviewer index, a source publication index, and a book authors and other contributors index.

For core sociology journals, all reviews published are listed here. For non-core journals, only those reviews are listed which represent books written by sociologists, or fall within a sociological area of interest. In some cases, the reviewer's attitude toward the book reviewed is assessed and noted as (++) Very Favorable, (+) Favorable, (0) Noncommittal, (-) Unfavorable, or (--) Very Unfavorable.

Readers of IRPS have been aware that, worldwide, there are three serials devoted primarily to reviewing books published by and for sociologists. These are:

Contemporary Sociology, published by the American Sociological Association (1722 N Street NW, Washington DC 20036)

SeleSociologia, published by Gianfranco Morra (Via Belle Arti 42, 40126 Bologna, Italy)

Soziologische Revue, under the editorship of Johannes Weiss of the Gesamthochschule Kassel FB5 (Heinrich-Platt-Strasse 40, 3500 Kassel, Federal Republic of Germany)

Effective with the No. 26 IRPS issue, Soziologische Revue has been added to the book review bibliography. Since all non-English language book titles have been translated into English, for all intents and purposes, a definitive bibliography of books published by and for sociologists in the Western world is now available for English-reading users.

We also wish to point out that reviewing sections have declined in major core sociology serials, and a new medium the 'newsletter,' is gradually entering the void thus created. Every effort is being made to locate newsletters that carry book reviews, and secure permission to have the reviews listed in the IRPS. We welcome information as to where and by whom such newsletters are published.

Adorno, Theodor W., INTRODUCTION TO THE SOCIOLOGY OF MUSIC, xii+233pp, no index, New York, NY: The Continuum Publishing Co., LC 75-33883, ISBN 0-8264-0403-0

Paper, $11.95

This translation by E. B. Ashton of Einleitung in die Musiksoziologie (Frankfurt-am-Main: Suhrkamp Verlag, 1962) is intended to provide a theoretical basis for understanding the relation between music & the socially organized individuals who listen to & perform it in 12 Chpts with author's Foreword to the 1968 edition, Preface to the 1962 edition, & Postscript. (1) Types of Musical Conduct identifies six primary types of musical listeners: expert listeners, good listeners, cultural consumers, emotional listeners, resentment listeners, & entertainment listeners. (2) Popular Music discusses the decline & demise of various sorts of popular music, & analyzes the social, aesthetic, & economic structure of US hit songs, arguing that mass popular music enforces conformity & undermines autonomy & independence of judgment. (3) Function examines the social function of music, arguing that, as ideology, it serves to mask inner emptiness, relieve boredom, train the unconscious for conditioned reflexes. (4) Classes and Rates discusses the past conformity of different types of music to particular SCs, & considers the role that music plays as ideological appearance concealing the existence of SCs. (5) Opera analyzes the divergence between the aesthetic substance & SS of opera, & why it has become obsolete with emphasis on the recent social history of opera in Germany & Austria. (6) Chamber Music contemplates the social characteristics distinguishing chamber music from sacred & orchestral music, such as purpose, audience, & the contradiction between conditions & forces of production. (7) Conductor and Orchestra considers the social role of the conductor, with relation to both the orchestra & the audience: the intentions & consciousness of orchestra members, & the significance of orchestras for composers. (8) Musical Life discusses the economic & social character of the life of musicians, at the local & international levels, contrasting the official life of music to that of dissidents. (9) Public Opinion and Critics critically examines the role & constitution of PO & the function of the expert in musical reception. (10) Nations discusses tension between the universality of music & the productive force of national elements, reviewing the music history of several countries & tracing the increasing postwar internationalization. (11) Avant-Garde considers the relation of form & content in postwar avant-garde music, the role of rationality in it, the effects of the larger social production process on it, & the social relations of its composers. (12) Conclusion reflects on problems in a sociology of music that attempts to comprehend aesthetics, production & distribution, ideology & superstructure, rationality, & technology. Postscript: Sociology of Music.

Cloth $39.95

Aclarising from the 1983 symposium of the Colston Research Society held at the U of Bristol, GB, that explores the value of & need for utopian thinking in current & future planning from an interdisciplinary perspective presented in III PARTS & 17 Chpts with an editors' Preface, Introduction, & Postscript. Two main approaches to utopian thought are represented, distinguishable by the ways they construct, analyze & critique utopias—the theoretical & practical, transitional approaches are also included. PART I - CONCEPTIONS, DEFINITIONS AND INTENTIONS - includes (1) J. C. Davis: The History of Utopia. The Chronology of Nowhere: questions the historiographical construction of utopias proposed by Frank E. & Fritz P. Manuel in Utopian Thought in the Western World (Oxford: Blackwell, 1979) & proposes a new ahistorical definition of utopias as distinct from other types of ideal societies. (2) Ruth Levitas: Need, Nature and Nowhere examines social, emotional, & appetitional factors stimulating construction of utopias, their current location, & social role with focus on the socially constructed needs they are designed to fulfill. (3) Peter Alexander-Grimm's Utopia: Motives and Justifications - is concerned with motives underlying the theoretical construction of utopias, comparing them to those of fairy tales. (4) C. West Churchman: The Design of a Perfect Society discusses the concept of perfection historically & philosophically, expressing pessimism about the possibility of perfect societies. (5) Keith Graham: Consensus in Social Decision-Making: Why Is It Utopian? questions whether consensus in decision making is utopian along with the role of utopian considerations in moral & political thought. (6) J. F. C. Harrison: Millennium and Utopia compares & contrasts utopias & religious millennialist movements, demonstrating the religious elements in utopian thought & their functional significance. PART II - FEATURES AND IMPACT OF UTOPIAN THOUGHT offers (7) Barbara Goodwin: Economic and Social Innovation in Utopia considers some of the main SE problems with which utopias have been concerned, & connects utopian ideas on inequality, work, & the position of women to actual social change. (8) W. H. G. Armytage: Utopias. The Technological and Educational Dimension discusses the implementation of utopian ideas regarding technology & education. (9) Robert Fishman: Utopia in Three Dimensions. The Ideal City and the Origins of Modern Design reviews the concept of the "ideal city" & the idea that rebuilding cities is the first step toward changing societies, arguing that the consequences in practice have often been the opposite of those intended. (10) Roger Gill: In England's Green and Pleasant Land examines various strategies underlying two London (England) Plans of the 1940s & shows how they were enriched by utopian ideas. (11) Donald F. Pitzer: Collectivism, Community and Commitment: America's Religious Communal Utopias from the Shakers to Jonestown demonstrates the most constructive & destructive elements of religious communal utopias, as epitomized by the Shaker movement & the 1978 Jonestown (Guyana) mass suicide, respectively.

PART III - THE USES AND NECESSITY OF UTOPIAN THOUGHT - contains (12) Alasdair Morrison: Uses of Utopia discusses some functions that utopian literary works can serve, particularly in the present era of rapid technological change, but raises cautions concerning the practical implications of utopias in the larger context. (13) Steven Lukes: Marxism and Utopianism examines the relation of Marxism to utopianism, exposing both some pro- & anti-utopian viewpoints in Marxist literature. (14) Milan Šimečka: A World with Utopias or without Them? questions whether utopias are seductively deceptive & contain the seeds of their own destruction, then reviews reasons why the modern world needs utopias to maintain social hope. (15) Mark Holloway: The Necessity of Utopia claims that "utopias of yesterday are the realities of today," & must be studied if improvements are to be made in the future, with focus on the necessity of believing in the concept of free will & the (misplaced) hope of perfection. (16) Peter Hall: Utopian Thought: A Framework for Social, Economic, and Physical Planning asks whether planning can be effectively undertaken without a utopian element & stresses the necessity of recognizing constraints posed by existing SE frameworks while maintaining a "strong sense of the art of the possible." (17) Bernard Suits: The Grasshopper: Posthumous Reflections on Utopia continues Aesop's fable of the grasshopper & the ant to demonstrate that there are logical reasons why consideration (even if it results in rejection) of utopias is necessary for future planning. 7 Illustrations. 288 References.

* Several reasons that led to the preparation of this Dictionary (an instructive vol) are noted. (1) All too many sociologists compose long "dithyrambic encomia" about important concepts introduced by famous sociologists, but do not quote "even a sentence from the original." (2) Sociologists define in their own terms momentous concepts of other sociologists but again "never quote even a few words from the original." (3) All too often in the literature, "the year in which a classic was reprinted is given, but not its original date of publication." (4) Many dictionaries provide definitions, but there is a need for one that provides quotations. The references are sociohistorical, in contradistinction to sociology au-

Vol 2 in a two-vol collection of essays (for abstract of Vol 1, see IRPS 87-43/88c00969) on the present & future development of the world's largest cities, based on research presented at the conference "Giant Cities of the World and the Future" in Barcelona, Spain, in Feb 1985, sponsored by the International Social Science Council, presents research on 10 of those cities in 10 Chpts with editors' Introduction. Each Chpt examines the history of a city, patterns of its development, its internal economic structure as well as its economic relation to the nation & the world, its demography & ecology, its transportation, housing, & other infrastructure, the most pressing problems attending its development, attempts to relieve these problems through Ur planning & their success or failure & projections for its future development. ¶ An examination of the current controversy surrounding welfare in the US, presented in 7 Chpts with an author's Preface. Though the tax-paying public, the government, & the poor hate welfare, they continue to rely on it as the primary response to poverty. It is argued that welfare can never provide an effective solution, since it addresses only the symptoms of poverty. Focusing on the case of the poor family with children, the causes of poverty are illuminated, & necessary changes in policy are proposed. (1) Beyond Welfare explores the unpopularity of welfare & suggests that debates over whether the system should be replaced or reformed are grounded in conflicts between values & expectations in US society. (2) Values and the Helping Conundrums elaborates on the major values that come into conflict regarding welfare: the autonomy of the individual, virtue of work, primacy of the family, & desire for community. The history of social policy from the 1930s to the present is examined, with focus on three conundrums that make conflict between values inevitable. (3) The Transformation of America's Families argues that the changing structure of US families is the primary cause of increased poverty. These changes, in turn, are the result of major social, economic, & cultural transitions, which are unlikely to be influenced by changes in policy. (4) Poverty among Two-Parent Families, (5) Poverty among Single-Parent Families, & (6) Ghetto Poverty discuss the dimensions of poverty among these family types, & the ghetto poor, respectively. Solutions proposed to deal with the causes of poverty in each situation are evaluated. (7) Choosing a Future summarizes why existing social policy has failed to alleviate poverty in each of those types of family situations, & proposes five major reforms: (A) universal medical protection, (B) increased advantages to working, (C) uniform child support assurance system, (D) conversion of welfare into a short-term, transitional system, & (E) provision of minimum wage jobs to those who have exhausted their transitional support. Welfare must be replaced by policies & programs that permit all those willing to assume some responsibility for themselves to escape poverty. 15 Tables, 17 Figures

¶ Vol 71 in the series Contributions in Sociology (originally published in Italian as La storia e il quotidiano [no publication information provided]), this book attempts to show how mass media, particularly TV, are undermining oral culture, the consequences of this loss for society, & the potential of a sociology that recovers internal awareness through attention to biography, in 3 Chpts with the author's Preface. (1) The Interrupted Conversation considers the power of oral culture to appropriate history & the everyday, the loss of this power through the mass media, renewed interest in oral history, the theoretical contributions of Marshall McLuhan & Arnold Adams Innis (see Carey, James W., "Harold Adams Innis and Marshall McLuhan," Antioch Review, 1967, 67, 1), the monopolization of knowledge & the impact of technology on human expression & self-conception. (2) The Crisis of the Event: The Decline and Transfiguration of Charisma reflects on the crisis for Western European culture created by the introduction of new actors on the world stage & by cultural pluralism, efforts by European intellectuals to retain their self-perceived role in world history, & the charismatic appeal, mediated by TV, of religious sects to Westerners faced with increasing uncertainties. (3) New Historicism and Life Histories discusses the traditional gap between intellectual understanding of history & everyday life, commenting on Paul Veyne's criticism (Come si scrive la storia, [How History Is Written], Rome-Bari: Laterza, 1973), of Max Weber. A new historicism, utilizing life histories, is argued for, a sociology based on a methodology of listening that commits none of the errors of positivist quantification or mystifying psychologism, the scientific quality of such an endeavor is defended. ¶ A collection of essays by members of the Women & Work Research Group, dealing with historical & contemporary developments in the nature, organizational structure, & SFS of women's work in the US, in the relations between public & private spheres of women's work, & in women workers' consciousness of their position, in III PARTS & 14 Chpts with editors' Preface. (1) The Women and Work Research Group Introduction: Considerations in the Study of Women and Work thematically links the following contributions in various ways, outlining the combination of forces preventing economic progress for women & emphasizing the importance of looking at many factors before judging the effectiveness of strategies for change. PART I - STRUCTURES, PATTERNS, AND IDEOLOGIES - considers the systematic & institutionally created & reinforced dimensions of women's work experience, in (2) Natalie J. Sokoloff: What's Happening to Women's Employment: Issues for Women's Labor Struggles in the 1980s-1990s looks at long-term processes contributing to economic problems facing women, particularly deskilling & an increase in part-time & service sector jobs, addresses such immediate concerns as unemployment, "home" work, occupational sex segregation, racism, & internationalization of labor, & examines Reagan administration policies affecting women's livelihoods & resistance to the undermining of affirmative action, (3) Evelyn Nakano Glenn: Racial Ethnic Women's Labor: The Intersection of Race, Gender, and Class Oppression examines the work experience of Chinese, Mexican-American & black women in the US over the past century, showing a divergence from the experience of white women, & demonstrates how the Marxist feminist analysis of women's subordination can be revised to be more inclusive of race-gender interaction, (4) Roslyn I. Feldberg & Evelyn Nakano Glenn: Technology and Work Degradation: Effects of Office Automation on Women Clerical Workers critically contrasts the consensual & critical models of analysis for gauging the impact of automation on office work, analyzes the effects of reorganization on the levels of occupational structure, industry, & work process, & finds that women generally have been more negatively affected than men, but that these effects, & the responses to them, are often specific to particular segments within the F clerical LF; (5) Christine E. Bose: Devaluing Women's Work: The Undercount of Women's Employment in 1900 and 1980 compares US Census data of 1900 & 1980 & changes in definitions & codes, argues that the perceived increase in women's employment in the twentieth century is due largely to shifts in the ability of women's work to be counted, & discusses the ideological basis of census counts of women's work, & (6) Amy Gilman: "Cogs to the Wheels": The Ideology of Women's Work in Mid-19th-Century Fiction analyzes the treatment of working women in US antebellum popular fiction & in the works of Nathaniel Hawthorne & Herman Melville, arguing that the former sentimentalized & idealized the position of working women, legitimizing the feminization of poverty & women's secondary status, while Hawthorne & Melville were more likely to confront the negative economic & cultural realities of women in the new factory system. PART II - LINKS BETWEEN THE PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SPHERES - explores the complex links between labor in & out of the home, in (7) Carol A. Brown: The New Patriarchy examines the shift in the basis of patriarchy, the control of women's labor by men (from the private sphere of the family to the public sphere of industry & government), considers the implications of this shift for different groups, & argues that women as a class are better off under public patriarchy, (8) Myra Marx Ferree: The Struggles of Superwoman uses data from an interview study (N = 103 employed married mothers) to describe the efforts of women to perform both paid & family work & analyzes how their results the ideology of the superwoman role can be seen in their struggles. family aid in housework; (9) Carole Turbin: Reconceptualizing F Work, and Labor Organizing: Working Women in 1860-1890 shows how family relationships among F & M Irish enhanced successful work place organizing for unionized F shirt workers & M iron molders in nineteenth-century labor unions of N.Y. & (10) Susan Lehrer: A Living Wage Is for Men Only: Min Wage Legislation for Women, 1910-1925 explores why, in the first of the twentieth century, minimum wage legislation for women failed to gain legitimacy at a time when other forms of sex-specific labor were being upheld as constitutional, showing that the ideology of traditional M-headed family structure was responsible for both reform & the government's limited views of possible solutions to the problem of women's low wages & overwork. PART III - CONSCIOUSNESS, RESISTANCE - examines the hidden aspects of culture, consciousness & resistance as they affect women & their work, & includes (11) Crull: Searching for the Causes of Sexual Harassment: An Examination of Two Prototypes analyzes the causes of sexual harassment, using distinction between traditional & nontraditional women's work plans, discuss the tension between sexuality & hostility as men face declining subordination, (12) Evelyn Nakano Glenn: The Dialectic Wage Work: Japanese-American Women and Domestic Service, 1905-1940 uses data from a case study involving in-depth interviews (N = 15 Japanese-born, 12 American-born, & 7 American-born but Japanese-educated women) to describe the historical context in which Japanese-American women's specialization in domestic work in the San Francisco Bay area evolved, details the experiences of domestic workers & argues that they developed a sense of autonomy & self-reliance through their efforts to gain control over their work, (13) Kesselman: Hidden Resistance: Women Shipyard Workers after World War II examines a case study of women shipyard workers during World War II in Portland, Ore. & Vancouver, Wash., to show how some women resisted postwar exclusion from their wartime jobs, but only on an individual basis, & (14) Roslyn I. ¶ Vol I in a two-vol collection of essays (for abstract of Vol 2, see I No. 41/88c00970) on the present & future development of the world's largest cities, based on research presented at the conference "Giant Cities of the World and the Future" in Barcelona, Spain, in Feb 1985. Sponsored by the International Social Science Council, is presented in 11 parts with editors' Preface & Introduction & a Foreword by Luis Roldán. Introduction: How Giant Cities Will Multiply and Grow discusses worldwide metropolitan trends & projections, the forces behind the growth of giant cities, & their impact on the Third World, where the greatest increase in the number & size of giant cities is taking place. Mattei Dogan: Giant Cities as Maritime Gateways demonstrates that most large cities are or have been ports, & proposes an explanation for this based on a break in the transportation of commodities. (2) John Kasarda: Economic Restructuring and America's Urban Dilemma relates the decline in many US urban centers to changes in the country's economic structure, showing that cities are evolving from centers of goods processing to centers of information processing, & discusses policy alternatives for improving urban environments & helping those displaced by economic transformation. (3) Manuel Castells: High Technology and Urban Dynamics in the United States examines economic trends within & among US cities, including the decentralization of urban areas, the division of industry between the Northeast & the Southwest, & the internationalization of the economy, & considers the importance of high technology in shaping & accelerating these processes. Peter Hall: Urban Growth and Decline in Western Europe develops a sequential model of deurbanization & uses it to compare European cities with one another & with US cities, finding regional variations in the degree of deurbanization. (5) Jürgen Friedrichs: Large Cities in Eastern Europe analyzes the problems of housing shortages & planning inefficiency for Moscow, USSR, Budapest, Hungary, Warsaw, Poland, Prague, Czechoslovakia. A study of the importance of political organizations for linking the behavior of voters & political elites, taking as its subjects the Netherlands-where organizations & parties correspond to subcultures identified as socialist, Protestant, & Catholic & Austria whose subcultures are characterized as Catholic & socialist, in 7 Chpts. (1) Introduction. (2) Elites, Organizations, and the Political Subculture: Origins, Growth, and Cohesion-describes the origins & growth of Dutch & Austrian organizational networks beginning in the nineteenth century, factors influencing subcultural cohesion, & ways in which elites have pursued organizational development while organizations in turn have affected elites. (3) Subcultural Organization and Mass Segmentation: From cradle to Grave-explains why people are segmented into sets of organizations & personal contacts that parallel the lines of political cleavage, arguing that not political beliefs, but the organizational structure maintained by subcultural elites to reinforce subcultural boundaries, determines political behavior, & measures the political segmentation of the masses in associational & personal behavior, accounting for variations of subcultural strength across regions & SE divisions. (4) Segmentation and the Electoral Process-gives the historical-legal contexts of the electoral systems in Austria & the Netherlands, & demonstrates that elections have come to represent a social census as much as political choice. (5) Electoral Behavior and Voter Consistency: The Influence of Subcultural Organizations-presents data (primarily from national surveys of the 2 countries) showing that patterns of mass voting behavior coincide with variations in the regional & temporal development of subcultural organizations, with strong organizational structure corresponding to high voter consistency. (6) Electoral Behavior: The Subcultural Bases of Party Support-compares the extent to which each of the 5 subcultures studied (3 in the Netherlands, 2 in Austria) has succeeded in securing the allegiance of its target population, confirming the thesis that the mediation network of subcultural organizations is crucial in linking masses with voters. (7) Political Organizations and Political Strategies: Recent Changes and Directions-discusses the factors affecting the ability of voters to pursue the organizational connection with voters, & considers ways party strategies have changed in response to the decline of subcultural organizations & to changes in the ambitions of party leaders. Volume 77 in the series Contributions in Economics & Economic History (Series Editor, Robert Sobel), this collection of essays treats the peculiarities of SC formation in Third World countries where the capitalist mode of production coexists with other modes & social structures, in 11 ARTS & 7 Chpts, with editors' Introduction & Conclusion. PART I - THE SETTING - contains (1) Nelson W. Keith: Class Analysis in the Periphery: A Partial Evaluation-provides the theoretical focus for the volume, arguing against orthodox Marxism's insistence on the absolute determination of all social formations by the economic basis & the necessity of revolutionary change. A historical model of capitalist formation from the center (Europe) to the periphery (Third World) argues that chronic undercapitalization has combined with sociocultural factors to produce peripheral social formations characterized by a lack of presence of normal capitalist classes, the persistence of unfree peasant labor, & forms of the state that play a larger social role than in central economies. Revolutionary leadership in such societies is seen to emerge from noncapitalist coalitions. PART II - CASE STUDIES - includes (2) Richard Curtin-The Colonial State, Migrant Labor, and SC Formation in Papua New Guinea-focuses on the role of the colonial state in SC formation through its control of labor, established by a plantation labor system that has fostered a dual dependency on both wage & subsistence labor & has perpetuated backwardness among the peasantry; (3) Jay R. Mandle-Agricultural Transformation in Developmental Socialism: The State and the Peasantry-discusses the control of peasant agricultural labor by socialist states, pointing out the conflict between the economically sound formation of agricultural cooperatives & the preference for centralized planning. (4) Allen M. Howard & David F. Skinner: Ethnic Leadership and Class Formation in Freetown, Sierra Leone-counterposes ethnicity to class as a principle for consciousness & political action, demonstrating the historical role of ethnicity in the transformation of noncapitalist relations & the occupation of leadership positions in Sierra Leone. (5) Thomas Bamat: Political Change and the Catholic Church in Brazil and Nicaragua-depicts the evolution of liberation theology from the integration of the Catholic Church with revolutionary practice in Latin America, & explores the fundamental contradiction between organizing principles of the Church based on obedience & radical socialist politics based on popular will, resulting in conservative hierarchical opposition to grass-roots political participation. (6) Steven L. Johnson: Ideological Dimensions of Peasant Persistence in Western Kenya-challenges prevalent notions that Kenya is an entirely capitalist economy by showing that a noncapitalist mode of production still operates in Ru western Kenya, where peasants' control of the forces of production & ideological factors have contained the spread of capitalism; & (7) Dean Forbes: Conflict, Class, and the Urban Poor in the Third World-examines the informal economic sector in Third World cities, particularly in Jakarta, Indonesia, emphasizing the importance of considering human agency, & not focusing entirely on structure, in understanding social protest & political action. Conclusion: Novella Zett Keith: Notes on Theory and Method for Third World Studies-argues for the inclusion of cultural & ideological factors such as religion & morality & for greater eclecticism in developing theories of revolutionary change in the Third World. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 430 References.

* An investigation of the relation between politics & scholarship in the social sciences in the US since WWII, this book takes as its thematic impetus a 1948 report by Talcott Parsons (published here for the first time) intended to influence inclusion of the social sciences in the National Science Foundation (NSF), & goes on to cover both Parsons's role in the development of the social sciences, & the evolution of federal funding for them, in IV PARTS & 13 Chpts, with editors' Preface & Introduction. PART I - NEW YORK: THE CAMPAIGN FOR THE SOCIAL SCIENCES-deals with the Social Science Research Council (SSRC) & its efforts to obtain Congressional funding for the social sciences, & includes (1) Samuel Z. Klausner: The Bid to Nationalize American Social Science-describes the postwar creation of the NSF & the historical context for its limitation to the natural sciences, the mobilization of social science professionals in an effort to be included, & the commission & subsequent rejection of the Parsons report by the SSRC. (2) Talcott Parsons: Social Science: A Basic National Resource-a report on the status & importance of the social sciences in 1948, covering the place of science in general in industrial society, the application of scientific method to society, the history of & theoretical advances in social science, practical contributions of social science (particularly to the war effort), institutional & professional aspects of the social sciences, & prospects & requirements for future development, & (3) John W. Riley Jr.: The Status of the Social Sciences, 1950: A Tale of Two Reports-compares the Parsons report & the circumstances of its writing to Riley's own report to the Ford Foundation on the same subject at the same time. PART II - CAMBRIDGE: PARSONS AND EMPIRICAL RESEARCH-covers Parsons's work & the creation of the Social Relations Dept at Harvard U, in (4) Bernard Barber: Theory and Fact in the Work of Talcott Parsons-discusses Parsons's understanding & use of the relation between theory & fact in social science, explaining why his understanding of their reciprocal relation was inadequately reflected in his predominantly theoretical work. (5) Benton Johnson & Miriam M. Johnson: The Integrating of the Social Sciences: Theoretical and Empirical Research and Training in the Department of Social Relations at Harvard-describes the founding of Harvard's Dept of Social Relations in 1946 & Parsons's role in its development, & (6) Victor M. PARTS & 8 Chpts, with an Epilogue & author's Introduction. PART I - BIOGRAPHY OF A SCHOOL - describes the developments in social relations & in academic performance in one high school (called Hamilton High) in four stages, beginning with its founding in 1953, in (1) An Elite Public School, 1953-1965 uses data from interviews (11 not given) conducted during 1979 field research at 33 schools) & document research to reconstruct the postwar environment in a white UMc high school; (2) Deconstruction of the Old World, 1966-1971 - describes the upheaval following successes by the civil rights movement & the rapid desegregation of the school, in particular, problems & opportunities created by the breakdown of traditional authority, the loss of homogeneity, & the drastic increase of violence; (3) Let the Students Decide, 1971-1979 - portrays efforts to extend equality of educational opportunity, the rise of students' & parents' consciousness of individual students' rights, & the consequent decline in discipline & the social community of the school, the most significant result being the restructuring of the school environment along legalistic-bureaucratic lines, & (4) The Second Transformation, 1980-1985 - depicts the further curricular & social changes brought about by mainstreaming handicapped children & by an influx of Asian immigrant children. PART II - MAKING A WORLD - develops a theoretical model of the social world created in a high school in an attempt to diagnose & propose remedies for the increasing anomie depicted in PART I, & contains (5) Why Schools Differ - argues for the importance of a positive school ethos, & discusses the essential role played by authority & the contributions of policy, family, & cultural factors to the development of authority relations, contrasting the ethos of Japanese schools to that of US schools, (6) The Teacher's Predicament - describes the undermining of the individual & social bases of authority of high school teachers & the negative consequences for both teachers & students, (7) Creating a Strong Positive Ethos - examines positive examples of ethical & intellectual communities in two private schools & one public school, & (8) Two Essential Reforms - proposes that control of schools be transferred from the city or district level to the teachers & principals themselves, & that the teaching profession be reformed to increase the responsibility of teachers in curriculum development, hiring, & peer evaluation. Epilogue Voices from Hamilton High - reports on a teachers' committee formed at the studied high school in response to the research, the committee's reaction to the text, & its initial steps toward reform. 5 Tables.

¶ This translation from Hungarian (4 mindennapi élet, Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1970) by G. L. Campbell is a basically social-phenomenological analysis of everyday life invested with certain concepts of the early Karl Marx, in IV PARTS & 13 Chpts, with a Preface written for the translation by the author. PART I - PARTICULARITY, INDIVIDUALITY, SOCIETY, SPECIES-ESSENTIALITY - includes (1) The Abstract Concept of 'Everyday Life' - explains everyday life as the self-reproduction of the person & of society, (2) The 'Person' - A Breakdown of the Concept draws & explores the distinction between egoistic particularity & more developed individuality & the role played in this distinction by choice & autonomy, & (3) The Person and His World - examines various aspects of the relation between person & world, including class participation, interaction with group, crowd & community, & the reciprocal development of 'we-awareness' & self-awareness. PART II - THE EVERYDAY AND THE NON-EVERYDAY - contains (4) The Heterogeneity of Everyday Life - points out the range of heterogeneous skills & capabilities required in everyday life, & the mutual reciprocity of homogeneity & heterogeneity, & (5) From the Everyday to the Generic - analyzes the relationship between everyday life & consciously generic activities, eg. between labor & work, & considers the role of morals in development from particularity to individuality, the importance of religion, politics, & law, & distinctions between everyday & non-everyday thinking in science, philosophy, & art. PART III - THE ORGANIZATIONAL FRAMEWORK OF EVERYDAY LIFE - includes (6) Objectivation 'in Itself' and 'for Itself' - explains the philosophical concepts 'being-in-itself', 'being-for-itself', & 'being-for-us' as they apply to objectivations essential to the human species; (7) Species-Essential Activity 'in Itself' - describes the three components of activity 'in-itself' - objects, custom, & language, (8) The Common Properties of Species-Essential Objectivations 'in Itself' - analyzes the characteristics that human objects, custom, & language have in common, including repetition, rules & normativity, sign systems, economy, & context. The Special Properties of Species-Essential Objectivity Itself - examines each of the three realms of the in-itself to characteristics that distinguish them from one another; & (10) General Schemes of Conduct and Knowledge in Everyday Life - analyzes ways in which people appropriate the sphere of the in-itself, the features of pragmatism, probability assumptions, imitation, thinking, & generalization. PART IV - THE ROOTS OF THE AND OBJECTIVATIONS MAKING FOR SPECIES-ESSENTIALITY 'FOR ITSELF', AS GENERATED IN EVERYDAY LIFE - contains (11) Everyday Knowledge - discusses definition, transmission, & content of everyday knowledge, the distinction between everyday & scientific knowledge & between knowledge such as anthropological elements as anticipation, emotion, & perception, their determination of truth & rightness, & types of contemplation. Everyday Contact - analyzes types of social interaction at the everyday level, including talk & play, the roles of different emotions in contact, the spatial & temporal orientations of everyday contact, conflict & contentment; & (13) The Personality in Everyday Life - the relationship between personality & the structure of everyday life - arguing that everyday life is not necessarily alienated & that potential exist for the development of authentic personality & meaning.

¶ A collection of diverse studies exemplifying the field of sociology on the personal concerns & experiences of social scientists, in with an Introduction, which distinguishes personal sociology from kinds of social science, emphasizing the commitment & professional involvement, & comments briefly on the contributing authors. (1) J. Nash - It's Good for 'Em - Object Lessons in Youth Sports - makes the experience of a participating father to discuss the sociological importance of organized youth sports, focusing on object lessons on consciousness of leisure, the ritual destruction of valuable objects, the notion of a sense of well-being, dealing with failure, & handling conflict. (2) Louis A. Zurcher - Social Roles and Interaction - examines the use of autonomy & individuality in interactionally based role playing using personal experiences as a basis for observations about role conflict resolving, creativity, balancing, & expressing. (3) Stanley Lyman - Growing Up among Ghetto Dwellers - relates the precarities that shaped the author's sociological interests, including in his family's grocery store, participating in the wartime black & associating with Chinese- & Japanese-American groups. (4) Stanfield, H. - The Sociologist as Stranger - The Power Games: Relations - explains how the author's work has been formed in part by dealings with white power structures, discusses racism in science & sociology, & explores the role of racism in intellectual development. (5) Kathleen J. Ferraro - Battered Flesh and Shackled Souls - Partial Control of Women - reviews personal experience as a victim of violence, subsequent efforts in studying & establishing sheltered women, & political & organizational problems involved in helping battered women, & makes some observations about domestic violence in the greater social context & the difficulties posed by the training of social scientists. (6) Jaber F. Gubrium - Rationality and Critical Reasoning in Human Service Organization - uses personal observations about human service institutions, focusing primarily on child welfare & interpretive organizations of troubles & treatment in behavior, to portray a personal evolution from skepticism about Jaber's overrationalized view of organizational life to partial agreement. (7) Jeffrey W. Riemer - Work and Self - discusses how personal experience as an electrician was converted into "opportunistic" research on occupational autonomy, worker mistakes, & occupational development. Barrie Thorne - Political Activist as Participant Observer - Commitment in a Study of the Draft Resistance Movement - 1960s - describes the conflicts experienced as a result of simultaneity in & sociological observation of the draft resistance movement during the Vietnam War, detailing problems of partisanship between organizations & conflict over priorities, personal risk, & interpretation of experience, contrasts this experience with that of nonresearching in the feminist movement, & draws conclusions about participant observation. Bibliog of 220 items.

ated by several published works, & assesses the applicability to it of R. Popper's critique of historicism, calling for an explicitly theoretical & indeed Marxist approach (1) Marx, Class and Class Consciousness—examines the concept of class proposed by Karl Marx, emphasizing the importance of class consciousness. The Hegelian roots of the Marxist dialectic are traced, & it is argued that class consciousness refers to the will to change circumstances in certain ways. An examination of the Unity program shows how Marx translated this concept into the language of practical politics. (2) Mannheim, the Sociology of Knowledge and Social History critically assesses the value of Karl Mannheim's version of the SoK (see Ideology and Utopia, London, 1936) for exploring the problem of class & class consciousness. Mannheim thought that identification of the social origins of ideological & utopian thought would permit discovery of the residue of truth in each. However, Mannheim faces the problem of how to exempt his own SoK from being considered utopia. Maurice Mandelbaum's The Problem of Historical Knowledge (New York, 1967) raises this question & attempts to defend objectivity & a correspondence theory of truth, but this approach is unsatisfactory. (3) 'The World We Have Lost' and How Class & Class Consciousness Can Help to Find It critically reviews Peter Jaquet's The World We Have Lost (London, 1971) & its claim that England in the late preindustrial period was a one-class society. (4) Historians, Class and the Early Nineteenth Century further examines English historians' concepts of class in early nineteenth-century England. (5) The Three-Class Model sets forth a five-class model of English society. I.e., the middling class of literates & artisans, industrial & organized workers, the other two & responds to criticisms of it. Correspondences are demonstrated to John Stuart Mill's analysis of class conflicts in his own time. A Letter to the Earl of Durham on Reform in Parliament, by Paying & Electing, London and Westminster Review, 1839, 32, 478-479. (6) Gerardo Himmelfarb's methodological criticisms ("Social History and the Total Imagination" in Art, Politics, and Will, Anderson, Donadio (Ed), New York, Marcus, 1977) are responded to & the need for historians to work, though cautiously, on Verstehen is argued. (7) Class and Class Consciousness, or the Right to the Whole Product of Labour reviews the statements of a number of writers of the past about property, authority, subordination, & SC in their times, emphasizing the assertion that laborers have the right to the whole product of their labor. (8) Women and Class Consciousness considers the situation of women in relation to class consciousness. Biographical data on Sarah Scott & Elizabeth Sharples (see Mavor, Elizabeth, The Ladies of Langollen, Harmondsworth, 1971) reveal some aspects of how women perceived SC. (9) Theory and Poverty of Theory offers a critical reading of several recent works in the Marxist tradition, including E. P. Thompson's The Poverty of Theory (London, 1978), Louis Althusser's Reading Capital (London, 1970), & Barry Hindess's & Paul Q. Hirst's Pre-Capitalist Modes of Production (London, 1975). Attention is also given to attacks on Marxist & Marxist historiography, in particular, Karl R. Popper's The Poverty of Historicism (London, 1961), which argues that since future events will be shaped by the emergence of new knowledge, which does not yet exist, it is impossible to have knowledge of what those events will be. His critique & others inspired by it in fact led to general attacks on Marxism & socialism. Marxist historians continued their work nonetheless & were largely well received by other historians, who generally gave the weight to theoretical or philosophical questions. At the same time, Marxist theorists as Althusser responded by attempting to develop a historical theoretical version of Marxism, which in turn was criticized by E. P. Thompson in an argument for history as a form of knowledge with its own logic. The claims of this logic to validity are critically evaluated, & the vital importance for Marxists of confrontation with actual historical data is argued.

Nelson, John S. (Ed), Megill, Allan (Ed) & McCloskey, Donald N. (Ed) (U Iowa, Iowa City 52242), THE RHETORIC OF THE HUMAN SCIENCES: LANGUAGE AND ARGUMENT IN SCHOLARSHIP AND PUBLIC AFFAIRS, xiii+445pp, Cl, Madison, WI: U of Wisconsin Press, ISBN 0-299-11020-6

(Cloth,$24.00)

Added in the series Rhetoric of the Human Sciences, this collection of essays derived from the 1984 U of Iowa Humanities Symposium on the Rhetoric of the Human Sciences, offers an interdisciplinary look at the different sets of rules for inquiry & the role of persuasive discourse in different scientific disciplines, in 22 Chpts with editors' Preface. (1) John S. Nelson, Allan Megill, & Donald N. McCloskey—Rhetoric of Inquiry—considers the renewed interest in rhetoric as the shortcomings of methodology are increasingly recognized, argues that argument is both more unified & more diverse than is commonly understood, & reviews some past treatments of the subject. (2) Michael C. Leff Modern Sophistic and the Unity of Rhetoric examines the traditional humanist resistance to rhetoric as dedicated to persuasion rather than truth, & suggests ways in which modern rhetoric can productively unify the technical & public domains. (3) Richard Rorty Science as Solidarity poses pragmatist alternatives to traditional concepts of rationality & objectivity in an effort to justify a rhetoric for the humanities. (4) Philip J. Davis & Reuben Hersh Rhetoric and Mathematics examines both the rhetorical use of mathematics & the rhetoric of mathematical utterances to demonstrate that even the most abstract & precise of sciences is a thoroughly rhetorical form of social interaction. (5) John Angus Campbell Charles Darwin: Rhetorician of Science explains Darwin's success in persuading the reading public & his peers of his theories as the result of his being a self-conscious rhetorician of science, & notes discrepancies between his rhetoric & practice. (6) Renato Rosaldo Where Objectivity Lies: The Rhetoric of Anthropology shows how styles of rhetoric in anthropological fieldwork become epistemic standards for inquiry. (7) Mistia Landau Paradise Lost: The Theme of Terrestriality in Human Evolution discusses bias in paleoanthropology influenced by narratives about human expulsion & liberation from nature. (8) Charles Bazerman Codifying the Social Scientific Style: The APA Publication Manual as a Behaviorist Rhetoric analyzes the publication manuals of the American Psychological Assoc., showing how its rules for professional rhetoric consolidate & carry forward the behaviorist of twentieth-century psychology. (9) Donald I. Carlston Turning Psychology on Itself: The Rhetoric of Psychology and the Psychology of Rhetoric explains what the social psychology of cognition can teach about the importance of rhetoric to inquiry, & how psychologists should apply these lessons to their own research. (10) Arjo Klamer As If: Economists and Their Subjects Were Rational examines the assumptions expressed in the rhetoric of economists, particularly the metaphors of rationality. (11) Richard Harvey Brown Reason as Rhetorical: On Relations among Epistemology, Discourse, and Practice unifies recent projects in sociology, generating a rhetorical conception of reason based on the dialectical interaction between abstract individual reasoning & concrete social order, & tracing how it figures in sociological research. (12) John S. Nelson Stories of Science and Politics: Some Rhetorics of Political Research discusses the rhetoric of inquiry of political science, the politics of science, & the rhetoric of politics. (13) Allan Megill & Donald N. McCloskey The Rhetoric of History describes the rhetoric of historiography, especially with regard to audience, & the tendency of the official rhetoric of the discipline to discount it. (14) Gerald L. Bruns On the Weakness of Language in the Human Sciences reflects on discourse in the human sciences, drawing on the conception of language advanced in the hermeneutical tradition of Wilhelm Dilthey, Martin Heidegger, & Hans Georg Gadamer. (15) Paul Hernadi Literary Interpretation and the Rhetoric of the Human Sciences portrays interpretation as three dialectically related moments of understanding, overstanding, & standing in for the subject, suggesting a radical alteration of recent theories & practices of inquiry in the human sciences. (16) David F. Klemm The Rhetoric of Theological Argument examines the rhetoric of theological argument as carried out in secular US, focusing on the metaphors for God used in theological arguments & the forms of those arguments. (17) James Boyd White Rhetoric and Law: The Arts of Cultural and Communal Life argues that law should be seen not as a system of rules but as a branch of rhetoric, by which community & culture are established, maintained, & transformed. (18) Jean Bethke Elshtain Feminist Political Rhetoric and Women's Studies looks at the relationship between women's studies scholarship & the political-rhetorical strategies of feminism, in an effort to resolve the occasional conflict between them. (19) Charles W. Anderson The Human Sciences and the Liberal Polity in Rhetorical Relationship suggests that Western ideals of science & politics support one another, & that classic liberalism can supply a pragmatist method for reasoned argument in both realms. (20) Michael J. Shapiro The Rhetoric of Social Science: The Political Responsibilities of the Scholar considers a literary frame of reference for understanding the ideological impact of scholarly discourse on public policy. (21) Michael Calvin McGee & John R. Lyne What Are Nice Folks Like You Doing in a Place Like This? Some Entailments of Treating Knowledge Claims Rhetorically views the renewed interdisciplinary interest in rhetoric from the point of view of the student of rhetoric, & cautions against abandoning the logic of inquiry to sophistry. (22) John S. Nelson—Seven Rhetorics of Inquiry: A Provocation brings together the concerns of the foregoing essays to urge a rethinking of the relations between ethics, politics, & inquiry, & seeks to provide a sense of what rhetoric of inquiry can ory of social action claiming universal validity, & argues that, contrary to common belief, this theoretical construction was specifically designed to provide social science with an appropriate basis for empirical research. PART III - WASHINGTON FEDERAL SPONSORSHIP OF SOCIAL SCIENCE - describes various facets of the development of government funding for the social sciences, in (7) Dael Wolfe - Making a Case for the Social Sciences - depicts the struggle to include the social sciences in the founding of the NSF, (8) Gene M. Lyons - The Many Faces of Social Science - discusses the development & chronically weak position of the social sciences in national science policies, & links this to the maintenance of a natural-scientific model for the social sciences, (9) Henry W. Riecken - Underdogging: The Early Career of the Social Sciences in the NSF - reviews the political struggles around the establishment of social science research in the NSF & describes typical strategies of advocacy & resistance that persist to this day, (10) Kenneth Prewitt - Federal Funding for Social Science - argues for greater attention to the "inadvertent system" of federal funding for the social sciences, ie, such resources as government statistics utilized by social science researchers, (11) Alex Inkeles - The Intellectual Consequences of Federal Support for the Social Sciences - examines the impact of such methods of government influence on research as tax exemptions for Colts & Us, considers the degree to which U-mediated government support can enhance the freedom of researchers, notes the various types of distortion of research made possible by more direct government support, & argues for higher levels of general support as a guarantee of balance, & (12) Dean R. Gerstein - Social Science as a National Resource: 1948 to 1982 - compares & contrasts the Parsons report with a related 1982 effort, seeking to explain why the latter was more positively received. PART IV - AN EDITORIAL - contains (13) Samuel Z. Klausner & Victor M. Lidz - Nationalization and the Social Sciences - discusses institutional constraints & unintended consequences resulting from government support for social science research, & the ways US culture & democratic politics affect the development of science & scholarship, & recommends (A) establishment of autonomous research institutes by US, especially for empirical research, (B) an independent National Foundation for the Social Sciences, (C) more applied, policy-relevant research that is government-independent, & (D) unity within sociology between theory & empirical techniques. 3 Tables.

¶ Problems internal to modern natural science, as well as in its relations with society, are addressed, centering on the dominant perspective of objectivism & the critical insights offered by phenomenology, in this vol of VI PARTS & 12 Chpts with author's Preface. PART I - THE SOCIOLOGY OF SCIENCE: ISSUES AND HYPOTHESES, ORIENTATIONS AND DISORIENTATIONS - contains (1) Antecedents: Science and Society, Objectivism, some Philosophical Issues - describes the current crisis in the meaning & practice of science, methodological problems of a critique of science, the necessity of investigating the relationship between science & society, & the critique of science developed by Max Horkheimer & Theodor W. Adorno, (2) The Contemporary Sociology of Science: A Source of Problems and Possibilities - reviews major works in the sociology of science, focusing on Robert K. Merton, & identifies questions about the inner character & practice of science that are raised but left unresolved by sociology, & (3) The Philosophy of Science and Social Theory: The Contemporary Debates - examines the debate concerning a critical understanding of science carried on by Karl Popper, Thomas S. Kuhn, Paul Feyerabend, & Jurgen Habermas, & outlines fundamental questions on technical, meaning, & cultural levels. PART II - HUSSERL: INSIGHTS AND DILEMMAS - critically analyzes the theory of science developed by the phenomenological philosopher Edmund Husserl in (4) Husserl's Formal and Transcendental Logic: The Phenomenological Account of the Structure of Science; & (5) Husserl's Crisis of European Sciences: Science and the Social World. PART III - OBJECTIVIST SCIENCE AND CAPITALISM: THE POSSIBILITY OF NON-OBJECTIVIST SCIENCE - contains (6) Objectivity and Capitalism: The Theory of Fetishism - examines Karl Marx's theory of the fetishism of commodities as a grounding of forms of objectivity in the relations of production, & considers its implications for an understanding of science & the social determinants of objectivity, & (7) Relativity Theory and Philosophy - discusses the theory of relativity & its background in Kantian philosophy, & argues that it represents the realization of the phenomenological perspective in the theory of nature. PART IV - DIVERSITY WITHIN MODERN SCIENCE - includes (8) Phenomenology and Structuralism - investigates the ambiguity in Husserl's theory of science, & in science itself, between the constitutive structures of theoretical systems & the meaning & truth of theories for subjects, & covers the criticism of objectivism to be derived from each perspective, & Quantum Mechanics and Philosophy - discusses the development of quantum mechanics, concentrating on the philosophical work of Bohr & its implications for language & objectivity in science, & argues that quantum mechanics shares its metaphysics, ontology, & epistemology with structuralism. PART V - INTRODUCTION TO THE SOCIOLOGY OF OBJECTIVITY - contains (10) Introduction to the Sociology of Object Domains - examines the formation of the object domain of science as an aspect of social determination, & argues that the theorization of an objectivistic object domain requires the employment of classical logic, & (11) The Sociology of Objectivity - maintains that a sociology of objectivity is necessary for a social theory of science, & suggests several approaches drawn from larger theories of knowledge & society, particularly phenomenology & Marxism. PART VI - CONCLUSIONS - contains (12) Epilogue: Paths to Be Explored - summarizes the foregoing discussion, & indicates the importance of applying the general arguments to specific domains of natural objects, in hopes of defeating objectivism & overcoming the crisis of science. 992 References.

¶ This vol in the International Library of Sociology series (John R. Heilbrunn editor), translated from Polish (Ruchliwość i teoria struktury społecznej, Państwowe Wydawnictwo Naukowe, 1982) by Barbara Zawadzka, addresses the problem of the dichotomy between social mobility & empirical research as it pertains to the subject of social mobility & suggests that a relevant theoretical orientation for research into social mobility can be developed from a synthesis of the social-structural theories of Karl-Marx & Max Weber, in 7 Chpts. (1) Presenting the Problem: Theories of Social Structure and Empirical Research - Mobility - notes the hitherto Weberian orientation of most social mobility theory, & argues for a greater emphasis on the class theory of Marx. Social Mobility and the Distributive Approach to Social Structure - reviews the history & contemporary status of research on social mobility & points out aspects of social mobility missed by overreliance on complex occupational indices & the implicit orientation toward distribution of goods instead of social relations. (3) Mobility and the Relational View of Social Structure - considers the theoretical approach exercised by Anthony Giddens, Frank Parkin, & J. H. Goldthorpe, & reinterprets Weber's remarks on monopolization to this social-relational perspective. (4) Social Mobility, the System of Inequalities and Ideology - discusses methodological presumptions of research into stratification, characterizing the concern with inequality of opportunity rather than inequality of conditions as typical of the distributive vs the relational approach, & urges that these assumptions be made explicit with each study. (5) Class, Strata and Social Mobility - develops a Marxist model of class & strata structure & suggests how it could integrate social mobility research by regarding relations of dependence as criteria of structural differentiation, & specifically treats the problems presented to this model by the new mobility research. (6) Capital, Power and Culture in Relation to Social Mobility - argues that occupational position, while significant, does not alone account for social mobility, & that capital ownership, political power, & cultural resources must also be taken into account. (7) Class Reproduction and Social Mobility - discusses the relation between social stability & social mobility, & considers cultural & institutional aspects of class reproduction that keep mobility within class bounds. 1 Table. ¶ An examination of the influence of Marxism on social history in England with emphasis on discussions of class & on the years from 1680 to 1850, in 8 Chpts with authors' Preface & Introduction. Introduction. Social History - points out the miscellaneous character of social history, as during the later nineteenth century grew out of the world economic crisis of 1873-1896: (9) Resat Kasaba Up the Down Staircase: British Policy in the Near East, 1815-74—examines the place of the Near East & British diplomatic activities there in the nineteenth century within the framework of the political economy of the time, & (10) Kathleen C. Schwartzman Portugal at the Neocolonial Fringe of the British Empire—assesses the changes in Portugal's trade profile during the nineteenth century (using statistics from 1874 to 1935) & how they reflect Portugal's integration into the world economy. PART IV - RETHINKING THE EMERGENCE OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCES IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY - concludes with (11) Immanuel Wallerstein—Should We Unthink the Nineteenth Century?—discusses the emergence of history, economics, political science, anthropology, sociology, & geography as branches of social science in the nineteenth century, seeing three premises as underlying it: historical progress, identification of progress as growth to rationalization & homogenization, & scientific knowability of historical/social processes; relies of which still hamper social scientific thinking. (12) John W. Meyer Society without Culture: A Nineteenth-Century Legacy describes nineteenth-century analyses of society as leaving out the vital element of culture, based on the assumption that modern societies' institutions were not simply cultural institutions but had some objective or rational validity, & (13) Raymond Drew Rethinking the Assumptions and Purposes of Nineteenth-Century Social Science—examines the birth of the social sciences as a manifestation of the cultural creativity of bourgeois society & shows how these sciences' assumptions require rethinking, in particular, the concept of secularization. 12 Tables, 2 Figures, 1 Map, 432 References.

A historical & sociological study of the role played by scholarly historical periodicals in the communication system of professional historians, in 8 Chpts. (1) Introduction summarizes the history of historical journals, offers some data about current publications, & discusses some distinctions among historical journals & between them & other scholarly periodicals. (2) The Historische Zeitschrift recounts the founding of the first modern scholarly historical periodical in Germany in 1859 & traces its development, especially through its first thirty-five years. (3) The Spread of Scholarly Historical Periodicals: France, Great Britain, and the United States describes the founding of the first successful historical journals in GB, the US, & France, their strategies for survival, & the differences in format & purpose among them. (4) Geographical Specialization: The Deutsche Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaft, the Mississippi Valley Historical Review, and the Journal of Southern History examines the development of geographical specialization among historical periodicals, taking as pioneering examples one German & two US journals, & considers problems caused & benefits yielded by the recent profusion of specialized periodicals. (5) Topical Specialization: The Zeitschrift für Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte, the Catholic Historical Review, and the Journal of the History of Ideas describes several journals specializing in topics, time periods, ethnic groups, events, or individuals, deals with characteristics & problems peculiar to specialized journals, & closely examines one German & two US examples. (6) Interdisciplinary Scholarly Historical Periodicals discusses factors influencing the need for & obstacles confronting interdisciplinary periodicals, & examines the founding & development of the journals Victorian Studies & Slavonic & East European Review. (7) Politics and Scholarly Historical Periodicals—examines various instances of political bias, intentional & otherwise, in historical journals, & the effects of political developments on their contents, particularly in Germany & the USSR. (8) Bibliographical Control and Use of Scholarly Historical Periodicals—discusses the development & maintenance of a system of bibliographies, guides, indexes, & abstracting services & how historians make use of it. (9) Scholarly Historical Periodicals: Retrospect and Prospect—describes patterns in the founding & characteristics of scholarly historical periodicals, including contributors, editors, economic factors, organizational structure, & intellectual orientation. 1 Table, Bibliog of 294 items.

Results of seven recent social psychological research efforts undertaken at Leningrad U are presented in a third book outlining for Western readers the status of social psychology in the USSR; all contributions were translated by F. Lockwood. (1) E. S. Kuz'min & V. P. Trusov Social Psychology at Leningrad University offers an overview of the development of Soviet social psychology & of major past & present efforts at Leningrad U & introduces this collection of papers by various researchers. (2) V. S. Magun Work Performance and Job Satisfaction: A Coexistence of Positive and Negative Correlations presents a psychometric investigation of the relationship between work performance & job satisfaction based on structural questionnaire data from 4,003 workers in 12 industrial enterprises. (3) N. Khriashcheva Small Groups under Conditions of Relative Social Isolation discusses the impact of social isolation on men serving at stations in the Antarctic (N not given) through sociometric analysis of the relationships among team members at 3 dates. (4) V. P. Trusov The Psychology of Interpersonal Evaluation in the Pedagogical Process examines person perception by adolescents using 2 bodies of data: from questionnaires completed by 90 adolescents with high, adequate, or low self-assessments (30 in each condition) & from questionnaires & teacher ratings for 66 seventh graders & 70 tenth graders. (5) S. M. Mikheeva & V. N. Panferov Material-Practical, Verbal and Cognitive Interaction in Dyads examines experimental data on partner interaction in dyads (N not given) with emphasis on change in mutual partner acceptance as a result of joint activity. (6) V. F. Semenov On the Development of the Social Psychology of Art examines the contribution of artists, specifically, fiction writers, to the development of social psychology, & also the contributions of social psychology to the study of art, based on content analysis of 114 descriptions of love & marriage in magazine fiction from 1918 through the 1960s. (7) V. N. This translation & revision (by the author) of La Femme transplantée: une étude du mariage franco-américain en France et le bilinguisme des enfants (Lille: Presses Universitaires, 1984) attempts to update & adapt its findings to a US readership, in 9 Chpts & 2 Appendixes with the author's Preface & a Foreword by Otto Klineberg. The experiences of expatriate US women who married French men & raised their children within the French family & social system are detailed using data from in-depth interviews (N = 20) & mail questionnaires completed by members of the Assoc of American Wives of Europeans (AAWE; N = approximately 60% of the 250 members in 1972); additional material is drawn from the relevant European, French, & US literature. Focus is on the bilingualism of the children in these marriages, particularly its social & psychological significance for the parents, & how linguistic development both affects & is affected by family relations. (1) Christine Bergman, American Citizen introduces a composite case study of a young US woman who married a Frenchman & moved to Paris & how her membership in AAWE helped ease the culture shock of this transition. Statistics on mixed-nationality couples in other countries are presented. It is argued that the US mother's attempt to adapt to a foreign culture often causes her to neglect the potential for important innovations in childrearing & interpersonal relations that could lead to the development of a new kind of individual: the bicultural, bilingual child. (2) The Transplanted American Woman details women's perceptions of the expatriate experience, showing how its qualitative & psychological aspects are closely tied to the administrative, legal, economic, & social realities of one's position in a new country. ¶ This vol consists of contributions from various perspectives on methodological & substantive issues pertaining to the interrelationship of individual development & social change, in 12 Chpts with editors' Preface (1) Marietta I. Baba & Bernard P. Zeigler: Evolution and Innovation in Sociocultural Systems: A Punctuated Equilibria Model proposes a model of social change that distinguishes between gradual fluctuations required to maintain homeostasis & disruptions in an equilibrium state leading to new forms of SE organization, locating a primary vector of cultural change in peripheral isolated agents (2) Erich W. Labouvie: Sequential Strategies as Quasi-Experimental Designs: Possibilities and Limitations in Explanatory Analysis (3) Jens Naumann & Klaus Hufner: Evolutionary Aspects of Social and Individual Development: Comments and Illustrations from the World System Perspective reviews the evolution of & current trends in human development studies & argues for a new world system model of modernization to replace the modern/traditional dichotomy (4) Rolf Steyer: Causal Regressive Dependencies: An Introduction (5) Alexander von Eye: Structure Identification Using Nonparametric Models (6) Richard M. Lerner: Individual and Context in Developmental Psychology: Conceptual and Theoretical Issues (7) Erich W. Labouvie & John R. Nesselroede: Age, Period, and Cohort Analysis and the Study of Individual Development and Social Change: examines analyses of individual development & social change that take into account chronological age, birth cohort, & time or period of measurement, & considers the significance of & distinctions among the different time parameters (8) David L. Featherman: Individual Development and Aging as a Population Process: argues for a methodological approach to the study of individual development & aging that treats them as synonymous population processes to be understood within a specific societal & historical context (9) Jochen Brandtstadter: Individual Development in Social Action Contexts: Problems of Explanation (10) Bernard P. Zeigler & Marietta I. Baba: Multifaceted Systems Modeling: Structure and Behavior at a Multiplicity of Levels (11) H. Jorg Henning & Georg Rudinger: Analysis of Qualitative Data in Developmental Psychology (12) David A. Kenny: The Generalized Group Effect Model addresses the problems inherent in attempts to study simultaneously processes at the individual & group levels by developing a model for studying the group-individual interface, comparing it to other designs in psychology, & using it to explain group polarization. 27 Tables, 43 Figures, 665 References

¶ This book is both an analysis of the status of blacks in US science & an assessment of the influence of race on the scientific careers of black Americans, & draws primarily on a comparative study based on interviews (N = 61 black & 14 white scientists) & questionnaires (N = 504 black & 722 white scientists), in III PARTS & 8 Chpts, with a Preface by the author. PART I - THE STATUS OF BLACKS IN THE AMERICAN SCIENTIFIC COMMUNITY - includes (1) Toward a Sociology of Black American Scientists: discusses the nature of the sociology of science, & describes the methodology & limitations of this study, (2) The Status of Black Americans in the Scientific Community: reviews studies on the historical contributions of blacks to science, science ability & potential, early career choices, participation in science education, & social factors that affect black participation in US science, & (3) Racial Differences in the Social Origins of American Scientists: examines racial differences in US scientists, from neighborhood & family to educational institution, & notes some significant patterns. PART II - ROLE PERFORMANCE OF BLACK AMERICAN SCIENTISTS - contains (4)

Race, Productivity, and Recognition in American Science - investigates whether there are racial differences in patterns of professional productivity or recognition among M scientists, finding that race is negatively associated with the number of articles produced, but positively influences career book output, (5) Insiders or Outsiders: Black American Scientists and the Communication System of Science - presents data showing racial differences in forms & patterns of communication & collaboration among scientists, concluding that blacks are somewhat excluded from the scientific communication system, (6) The Effects of Ascriptive Status on Scientific Careers: reviews studies on discrimination in recognition, prestige, & rewards, & examines historical trends in career patterns & career opportunities of black & white scientists, showing significant improvements in opportunities for blacks occurring after 1955 & 1964; & (7) (6) Being Black, Female, and Scientist - analyzes interview data to determine how the scientific careers of black US women are influenced by racial & gender statuses, & compares career patterns of black & white F scientists, noting that black women are less proportionally represented in science than other groups. PART III - SUMMING UP - contains (8) Race and Universalism in American Science: A Final Note - summarizes the significant findings of the study & suggests further research that could help to redress the problem of black underrepresentation in science. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, Bibliog of 176 items

¶ This collection of essays, No. 76 in the series Contributions in Economics & Economic History (series editor, Robert Sobel), & No. 10 in the series Studies in the Political Economy of the World-System (series editor, Immanuel Wallerstein), examines the history of the nineteenth century seen from the critical perspective of the twentieth, & suggests what can be learned from it, in IV PARTS & 13 Chpts with a Series Foreword by Immanuel Wallerstein & a Preface & an Introduction by the editor. Introduction "What Is to Be Learned?" presents the four parts of this vol: an examination of the US, an analysis of movements, transformations, & limitations, an examination of the British empire, & a reconsideration of the social sciences as they were developed in the nineteenth century. PART I - ECONOMIC EXPANSION AND POLITICAL INTEGRATION: THE UNITED STATES - contains (1) Richard Robinson & Joan Sokolovsky: Patterns of Industrial Regulation: Railroad in the World Economy: examines the relationship between state & class in the nineteenth-century US through a historical case study of the railroads, rejecting both the state & the unified capitalist class in favor of specific fractions of the capitalist class as agents for the emergence & railroad regulation, (2) Thomas D. Hall: The Transformation of the Mexican Northwest into the American Southwest: Three Paths of Internal Development: compares the historical development of Mexico's three northern regions: Tex., NM, & Calif. both before & after conquest by the US, showing the influence of the world system & its economy, (3) Philip McMichael: The Crisis of the Southern Slaveholder Regime in the World Economy: reinterprets the secession of the southern states of the US as a product not only of factors internal to the US but also of the evolution of the capitalist world economy, & (4) George M. Thomas: Cultural Contradictions and Religious-Political Movements in the Nineteenth-Century United States: notes the importance of revisionism as a source of support for both Republicanism & the Greenback movement. PART II - MOVEMENTS, TRANSFORMATIONS AND LIMITATIONS - includes (5) Juan Manuel Carrión: The Origins of Puerto Rican Nationalism: Precocity and Limitations of the Nineteenth-Century Independence Movement: points out the ambivalence of Puerto Rican attitudes toward nationalism prior to the US invasion & the fragility of the national movement, (6) Dale Tomich: "Second Slavery": Bonded Labor and the Transformation of the Nineteenth-Century World Economy: examines the abolition of slavery in the New World during the nineteenth century & the changes in the capitalist world system that impelled it, & (7) Michael S. Kimmel: "Disheveled Improvisation": Agrarian Resistance to Industrialization in the Late Nineteenth Century: compares three major social movements of the nineteenth century - anarchism in Spain & populism in Russia & the US - as forms of agrarian resistance to capitalism. PART III - BRITISH EMPIRE DYNAMICS AND REPERCUSSIONS - presents (8) N. K. ties of one's position in a new country (3) Mate Selection and Ensuing Conjugal Structures examines SF, educational, religious, & family background factors in these mixed marriages, & reveals that "like generally marries like." Conjugal structures & marital power are explored, along with problems women face in adapting to occupational & lifestyle changes & shifting national identities (4) "Mixed" and "Just Plain" Marriages demonstrates that problems in mixed marriages are due not so much to differences between the individual partners, but to the negative reactions that their relationship elicits from the primary groups to which they each belong. Consequences for them & their children, eg, confusion over cultural identity, are discussed (5) Bilingualism and Socialization explores the phenomenon of bilingualism & parents' worries about its potentially negative effects. Evidence is presented concerning the specific benefits of bilingualism for French-American children (6) The French-American Child's Daily Life compares "true" bilingual children with nonbilingual ones. The importance of English-speaking schools, vacations in Anglophone countries, & parental use of English for achieving bilingual proficiency at different ages is discussed (7) Effects of Conjugal Structures on Children's Bilingualism explores why, though the majority of French American families consider bilingualism desirable for their children, not all of them take the necessary steps to ensure that it is developed. The role of the father is crucial in making family choices that promote bilingualism. In addition, certain types of conjugal structure are more conducive to bilingualism (8) The Child as a Stake in the Marriage Game demonstrates how the child in a French-American family is in a potentially conflictive position between two very different cultures & linguistic systems. A hypothetical model is developed in which egalitarian spousal configurations result in joint efforts toward achieving a balanced bilingual child (9) New Identities examines long-term effects of expatriotism & the process by which a woman is transformed into a first generation bicultural. Their children become second-generation biculturals with a dual identity, political, philosophical, psychological, & emotional implications of such double nationality are discussed. Wood, Michael R. & Zurcher, Louis A., Jr. (Dept Sociology Hunter Coll, New York NY 10021), THE DEVELOPMENT OF A POST-MODERN SELF: A COMPUTER-ASSISTED COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF PERSONAL DOCUMENTS, viii + 179pp, Cl, Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, Inc., 1987-23666, ISBN 0-313-25458-3. (Cloth, $37.95)

This vol, in 11 Chpts with 2 Appendixes, is both a theoretical investigation of the development of self in response to social change & a presentation of an empirical procedure for analyzing personal documents for the purpose of charting that development. The theoretical part of this study investigates the nature, origin, development, & causes of the postmodern self by reviewing conflicting theories about the new self & new culture. The shift in cultural conceptions of character & definitions of self from an industrial to a postindustrial age is characterized as being (1) from rationality & unemotional performance to irrationality, mysticism, & expressionism, (2) from institutional standards, duty to society, achievement, & future time to individual standards, duty to self, gratification, & present time, & (3) from structure, stability, & constancy to process, transience, multiplicity, & experimentation. Discussions of the postmodern self are found to center around two meaning clusters characterized by the polarities institution/impulse & product/process. The empirical part of the study consists of both a qualitative & a quantitative analysis of diaries from nineteenth- & twentieth-century US authors, the quantitative analysis uses a computer approach in which the statistical incidence of key words is examined over time. (1) Introduction. (2) The Background of the Postmodern Self: Industrial and Postindustrial Society. (3) Speculations on a "New Self." (4) New Culture and Overdeveloped Modernism. (5) The Challenge of Studying Self and Social Change. (6) The Use of Personal Documents in Social Science Research. (7) Qualitative Analysis of Personal Documents: From Resolution to Realization. (Cloth $29.95)

Findings of a study of 8 industrial organizations using a variety of data-gathering techniques, primarily interviews, are drawn on to analyze transformations occurring in the workplace as a result of new information technology. The vol focuses primarily on the conflict between the judgment-capacitating ("informing") potential of new technology & traditional hierarchical authority structures, & suggests a reconceptualization of the management/labor dichotomy as a necessary condition for realizing the productive potential of computers, in III PARTS, 10 Chpts & 2 Appendixes, with author's Preface, Introduction, & Conclusion. Introduction Dilemmas of Transformation in the Age of the Smart Machine outlines the problems posed by the rapid introduction of new information technology, & describes the research used in the book. PART I - KNOWLEDGE AND COMPUTER-MEDIATED WORK - examines the historical role of the body in the workplace, & considers the cognitive & social-psychological requirements for developing & expressing knowledge in the computerized workplace, in (1) The Laboring Body: Suffering and Skill in Production Work reviews historical literature noting the integration of skill & knowledge with physical action, prior to the introduction of scientific management, & shows how the progress of automation has entailed a transfer of knowledge from workers to managers. (2) The Abstraction of Industrial Work describes the transition in three paper mills from action-centered to intellectual knowledge as the production process is computerized, & illustrates the personal impact of this shift on workers. (3) The White-Collar Body in History depicts the creation of white-collar work as a result of the rationalization of executive work, characterizes the skills essential to executive work as "acting-with" vs "acting-on," & shows how past technological progress has affected the distribution of these skills through a range of clerical jobs. (4) Office Technology as Exile and Integration portrays the use of computers to automate office work as an intensification of the industrialization of the clerical worker, & indicates how computers might be used to integrate clerical workers with, instead of excluding them from, the management process. (5) Mastering the Electronic Text analyzes the cognitive process & social-psychological consequences of the translation of implicit, action-centered skill into explicit intellectual knowledge, & considers how learned management/worker roles can impede the development of intellectual skills. PART II - AUTHORITY: THE SPIRITUAL DIMENSION OF POWER - focuses on the dilemmas of authority that develop as new demands for intellectual skills blur traditional distinctions between operational & managerial roles, in (6) What Was Managerial Authority? traces the historical development of belief systems that have served to legitimate managerial authority, how these belief systems have made management the exclusive repository of organizational knowledge, & recent challenges to this strict division between mental & manual labor. (7) The Dominion of the Smart Machine describes fears of managers as they are confronted with possible loss of their knowledge monopoly, their attempts to use computerization to increase automation & centralized control, & how these efforts combined with worker response, subvert the potential of information technology; & (8) The Limits of Hierarchy in an Informed Organization examines issues of learning, responsibility, & authority in workplaces where computerization has made evident the need for transformation of the traditional management structure. PART III - TECHNIQUE: THE MATERIAL DIMENSION OF POWER - considers managers' use of automation to increase behavioral control as a response to threats to their authority, & includes (9) The Informative Panopticon describes how information technology increases the visibility of workers' behavior as well as managers' performance to their superiors, discusses strategies employed to exploit or resist this increased transparency, & considers possibilities for enhanced integration when transparency is horizontal as well as vertical. (10) Panoptic Power and the Smart Text examines the ambivalent nature of computer conferencing among professionals, which can enhance productivity & social integration while simultaneously exposing participants to greater management control. Conclusion-Managing the Informed Organization-portrays an "informed" workplace, where redistribution of knowledge across job categories & replacement of the emphasis on hierarchy with one on wholeness would enhance human development as well as productivity. Appendix A-The Scope of Information Technology in the Modern Workplace-surveys the introduction of information technology into several areas of industry. Appendix B-Notes on Field-Research Methodology. 25 Figures.

BULLETIN OF THE AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH

The most widely read English-language journal on ancient Near Eastern studies, BASOR serves as a forum for scholars worldwide. The journal publishes technical reports of original research, reviews of current scholarship, and book reviews; subject areas include archaeology, history, anthropology, biblical studies, philology, and epigraphy. BASOR is published five times a year--February, May, August, and November, plus an annual supplement which includes preliminary reports of ASOR-sponsored excavations.

THE HEROIC MUSE: Studies in the Hippolytus and Hecuba of Euripides

by David Kovacs

Euripides the anti-traditionalist. Euripides the ironic. Euripides the hermetic. These views of the fifth-century Greek dramatist—while dear to twentieth-century critics—have led to a blindness in the critical interpretation of text, David Kovacs argues.

In The Heroic Muse, Kovacs brings Euripides into the mainstream of the tragic literary tradition, offering a detailed reconsideration of two plays, the Hippolytus and the Hecuba, against the background of the works of Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, Aeschylus, and Sophocles. The book demonstrates that Euripides' plays can be satisfyingly interpreted in fifth-century terms as reworkings—in Euripides' own individual idiom and accent—of traditional tragic themes.

problems and the emergence of a dialogue among the internationalists about the challenges which societies of nation states and need to be seen in a more active role. Sociologists of different backgrounds are also aware of a common point of departure that there already exists one global society. It would be an approach the complexity of global with an universalistic conception contrasting with the multitude of which "the world" is made. However, cannot simply be seen as agreed on the different ways often even through which it is seen. We witness not only a global scale which points to the growing interdependence of parts of the world process, but also a process of internationalization which really comes out of this globalization. There can be noticed nowadays in the sociological community a growing awareness that human life in the late 20th century are largely grounded on the emergence of a global society, not denying that this "world" is contradictory in itself, full of problems and tensions, yet nevertheless, it is the only one we have not only to investigate but also to strive for. The World, in its unity through diversity, is the global topic which now challenges the sociological discipline as an area of academic inquiry and practical application. An inescapable theme which certainly allows for very different perspectives, universalistic as well as pluralistic, and which excludes parochialism. Time is ripe to make fresh approaches to a new subject which brings at the same time rich promises and immense difficulties.

The Program Committee hopes that sociologists throughout the world will find the general theme attractive enough to participate in the next World Congress to be held after again in Europe after a span of 12 years. We have learnt from our experience that scientific topics are not the one and only reason to attend a congress. It is the quality of the academic program that is the measure of the success of a world congress. Therefore the Program Committee at its meeting in Rome spent several brainstorming hours selecting the appealing subthemes of six symposia, each with four sessions (total of 24 sessions) covering the general topic as much as possible. The intention was to stress thereby several major dimensions. In consequence, there will be plenty of food for thought at the Congress, for instance, about changing social, cultural and power structures in and between nation states within a context of global interdependencies, about new social actors and new social identities, about new technologies, changes of work and emergent interest groups and conflicts, about moral issues in a global society, and, of course, about the global problems and the social resources of survival. The theoretical level of analysis can be best labelled by universal discourse and diverse paradigms.

It is still too early to give exact information on what one can expect from the symposia sessions and other parts of the Congress program. A more detailed report will be published after the Executive Committee has ratified the proposals of the Rome meetings. Anyway, the program preparations are in full swing now.

The Congress' format adopted by the Program Committee is very similar to that of the last convention in New Delhi. Symposia Sessions (reduced to 24) in the mornings, 9 meetings for each Research Committee and Working Group in the afternoons, time-slots for special and ad hoc sessions late evenings. (Below you will find a provisional scheme)

One strongly requested innovation was made: the next Congress will be closed with a final Plenary Session generalizing its overriding results. While it will be for the President of the Association to address the forthcoming intellectual event at the Opening Plenary session, the Vice President in charge of the Congress program will invite to the Closing Plenary three outstanding scholars of our discipline to make an attempt of synthesising the main strands of thoughts on the selected topics.

The Program Committee left Rome with good feelings. First and foremost, the members felt indebted to the generous hospitality of the Italian colleagues. It has been a special merit of Paolo Ammassari that the Program Committee could have such a fruitful meeting in a stimulating environment. Moreover, the members really acted in a democratic way as a collective body and thereby got the feeling of an "esprit de corps" leading their work to creativity and efficiency. Finally, there was a jointly shared impression among the members of this newly founded Committee on having opened a new door to future sociology by proposing a World Congress program which, hopefully, will find the recognition of the academic community worldwide and will lead both to further advances of sociological knowledge, and to new answers to the crucial questions inside and outside the discipline.

SCIENTIFIC PROGRAM OF THE CONGRESS

Scientific program of the XII World Congress of Sociology will include:

Presidential Session

Organized by the ISA President, Margaret Steno (Monday 11:00-13:00);

Six Symposia

Consisting of 24 sessions. These six symposia will be held simultaneously from Tuesday through Friday 10:00-12:00.

Research Committee's sessions

Will be given nine time slots of two hours each: 10:00-12:00 and 17:30-19:30 from Monday through Friday ending at 17:00hrs, plus a slot for a business meeting. When two or more Research Committees plan a session, an additional period of two hours will be allotted for that purpose in the evening 20:00-22:00 hrs.

Working Groups

Will have the same time available as the Research Committees.

Ad Hoc Groups

Will be granted maximum of 5 sessions to be held in the evening 20:00-22:00 from Monday through Friday.

Ad Hoc Sessions and SSO (Special Session)

For international organizations affiliated to the ISA. Will be granted maximum 2 sessions to be held in the evening 20:00-22:00 from Monday through Friday.

PROCEDURES FOR SOLICITING AND ENDORSING AD HOC AND SSO SESSIONS

Special Interest sessions should be organized by organizations affiliated with the ISA, preferably international organizations. They should be of international content and of high academic quality. They should be allotted up to 2 sessions (10:00-12:00 in the evening 20:00-22:00) and a place in the evening. They should be organized by a committee of at least three persons, one of whom should be a sociologist. The committee should submit a proposal to the ISA Secretariat, which will be forwarded to the ISA Executive Committee for its consideration. The committee should also submit a list of potential participants to the ISA Secretariat.

The deadline for the submission of proposals to the ISA Secretariat is March 31, 1989. The deadline for the submission of proposals to the ISA Executive Committee is May 31, 1989.

TIME SCHEDULE FOR PROGRAM PREPARATION

REPORTS FROM THE COLLECTIVE MEMBERS OF THE ISA

In the previous issue of the ISA BULLETIN (No. 45) we have presented reports received from ISA collective members in category "A" (national sociological societies), category "B" (international and multinational regional associations of sociologists), and category "E" (supporting organizations and institutions). In this issue we present the remaining category "A" members whose reports reached us too late to be included in the last BULLETIN, and several reports from our members in category "C" (research institutions and university departments). The remaining reports from the category "C" members will appear in the next issue of the BULLETIN.

The Westermarck Society was founded in 1943 to promote sociological research in Finland. A special aim of the Society is to further the memory of Edgar Westermarck and his scientific works.

The most visible activity of the Society are the days of Sociology organized yearly together with the department of sociology at different universities.

Another annual activity is the Edgar Westermarck Memorial Lecture organized together with the Finnish Anthropological Association.

In December 1987 the Society had 943 members, 350 of them are students. The Board of the Society consists of 15 members who elect the President from their ranks. The Secretary can be a member of the Board or from outside. Present officers are:

President: Seppo Randell, University of Tampere
Secretary: Anssi Perakyla, University of Tampere
Treasurer: Kalevi Ojuri, University of Turku

The Society is a collective member of the ISA and of the Scandinavian Sociological Association (Nordiska Sosiologförbundet). Moreover, the Society maintains contacts with national sociological associations in several countries.

Publications
In the series "Transactions of the Westermarck Society" 20 volumes have been published so far. The title of the latest volume is "Bibliography of Finnish Sociology 1970-1979" edited by Terttu Tuomenvirta and published in 1985.

The Society is also publishing the Finnish Journal "Sosiologia" with English summaries. The Journal quarterly contains scientific articles, book reviews, news and notes. Editor: Antti Kivrio (Institute of Social Research, University of Tampere), Editor Secretary: Jari Aro (Same Institute).

CURRENT SOCIOLOGY

Each issue of this unique journal is devoted to a comprehensive 'Trend Report' on a topic of interest to the international community of sociologists. Authors review current trends and tendencies in all areas of sociological work - theories, methods, concepts, substantive research and national or regional developments. The aim is to review new developments, to discuss controversies, and to provide extensive bibliographies. From time to time, "Commentaries on Trend Reports" are published in subsequent issues of the journal. Recent reports have focused on industrial and post-industrial sociology, the sociology of humour, agrarian relations and modes of production in the Middle East, sex roles, and inequalities of class and sex.

Issues are published in French or English, but a text in one language is always accompanied by an extensive résumé in the other. CURRENT SOCIOLOGY is an official journal of the International Sociological Association. Its main aim is to review international developments in the discipline and to provide a forum from which professional sociologists from all countries can communicate with the widest group of colleagues.

SOCIOLOGIE CONTEMPORAINE est une revue unique en son genre. Chaque numéro est consacré exclusivement à la présentation d'un rapport-synthèse sur la recherche dans un champ ou sur un thème sociologique en particulier. Ces rapports-synthèse sont conçus de manière à ce que chaque numéro de la Revue puisse être intéressant pour des sociologues travaillant à l'intérieur d'un large éventail de champs spécialisés puisqu'ils mettent l'accent sur les concepts, les théories, les problèmes et les méthodes. Ces rapports-synthèse fournissent une vue d'ensemble en discutant des recherches les plus importantes réalisées sur le thème choisi à travers le monde, et en présentant une bibliographie sélective des travaux des principaux auteurs sur la scène internationale. Tout en synthétisant les contenus et en contribuant à la clarification conceptuelle, ces rapports se veulent un forum où des démarches méthodologiques et théoriques peuvent être évaluées et des nouvelles orientations signalées. En tant que publication officielle de l'ISA, le but principal de la revue LA SOCIOLOGIE CONTEMPORAINE est de rendre compte des développements internationaux de la discipline et d'encourager les sociologues de métier de tous les pays à entrer en contact et à communiquer avec le plus grand nombre possible de collègues.

The American Sociological Association (ASA), founded in 1905, is an organization dedicated to the research, teaching, and application of sociology. It seeks to stimulate and improve research, instruction, and discussion, and to encourage cooperative research among persons engaged in the scientific study of society.

The Association is affiliated with the Social Research Council, the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the American Council on Learned Societies, the International Sociological Association, the National Association of Public Anthropologists, the American Correctional Association, and other national sociological associations.

The American Sociological Association has approximately 12,000 members, of whom about 10,000 reside in the United States. ASA membership is in three categories: Regular Member, Associate Member, and Student Member, depending on academic or vocational status as well as on the degree to which a person is fully involved in the pursuit of sociological concerns.

The affairs of the Association are administered by the Executive Office, the full-time staff including the Executive Officer, and five other sociologists, in addition to a support staff currently numbering fourteen.

Programs administered by the Executive Office include a Teaching Services Program which assembles and distributes information and materials related to teaching, a Minority Fellowship Program, provides support to minority graduate students studying in school across the country, a Professional Development Program which strives to enhance the role of sociology and sociologists in public and private job settings.

The current officers of the ASA are:
President: Herbert J. Gans, Columbia University
President-Elect: Joan Huber, Ohio State University
Vice-President: Richard J. Hill, Oregon State University
Vice-President Elect: Glen H. Elder, Jr., N.C.A.
Secretary: Michael T. Aiken, Univ. of Pennsylvania
Executive Officer: William D'Antonio, Washington

The Association is governed by a Council which includes the officers and twelve members elected at large. The latter are elected for three years with four members elected every year. Over 100 committees participate in the multifaceted activities of the Association.

Publications:

"American Sociological Review" - the flagship journal of the Association is published bi-monthly and contains research papers and analysis.

"Contemporary Sociology, A Journal of Reviews" appears bi-monthly, and contains book reviews, symposia, and occasional reviews of the literature.

"Footnotes" - is published nine times a year and contains general news about the activities of the ASA, feature articles on topics of interest to membership and a number of regular columns.

"Employment Bulletin" - is published monthly and contains announcements of available positions.

The ASA publishes three quarterly journals.

"Social Psychology Quarterly" - devoted to research in social psychology;

"Sociology of Education: A Journal of Research on Socialization and Social Structure" - devoted to studies of education as a social institution.

"The Journal of Health and Social Behavior" - devoted to sociological analysis of problems of human health and welfare;

"Teaching Sociology" - devoted to various aspects and strategies for teaching sociology.

"Sociological Methodology" - is an annual publication about recent developments in research methods.

SAGE Studies in International Sociology

sponsored by the International Sociological Association/ISA

This Series was established by the ISA in 1974 in place of the transactions of World Congress of Sociology, which had been published since the Association's foundation in 1949.

The Series contains topical volumes based on work presented in the various sessions of World Congresses and reflecting the scientific activities of the ISA's Research Committees.

The books contain a selection of papers chosen for their scientific quality, their international representativeness and their relevance to the various debates currently taking place in the discipline.

Orders can be placed with SAGE PUBLICATIONS at any of the addresses below:

United Kingdom:

Cette collection a été établie par l'ISA en 1974 et remplace les actes traditionnels des congrès mondiaux publiés par l'Association depuis sa fondation en 1949.

La collection est composée de volumes thématiques construits à partir des travaux présentés dans les différentes sessions des congrès et elle reflète aussi les activités scientifiques des Comités de Recherche.

Les volumes contiennent une sélection de textes choisis pour leur qualité scientifique, leur représentativité internationale et leur pertinence quant aux principaux débats ayant cours actuellement dans la discipline.

JOURNAL OF THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION
ASSOCIATION INTERNATIONALE DE SOCIOLOGIE

INTERNATIONAL SOCIOLOGY, a quarterly, has been established by the ISA to publish papers which deserve worldwide circulation and which reflect the research and interests of the international community of sociologists. All branches of the discipline and all regions of the world are represented in its pages.

Contributions should be sent to an appropriate editor (see Guidelines for Contributors):

Editor: Martin Albrow (English, German)
University College, P.O. Box 78, Cardiff CF1 1XL, U.K.
Associate Editors:

Guidelines for Contributors:

1. Contributions may be submitted in any language, but will be published only in English. Contributions in English may be sent to the Editor or Associate Editors, in other languages to the appropriate editor, as indicated above. Where there is no indication of editorial coverage of a language, advice should be sought from the Editor. Authors of papers in other languages may receive translation assistance in suitable cases. Papers are refereed by an international panel whose names appear in the fourth issue of each year.
2. Contributions are considered for publication only on the understanding that they are not simultaneously under consideration elsewhere in English, that they are the original work of the author(s), and that any previous form of publication is disclosed. Copyright is retained by the author, but the Journal is licensed to reprint.
3. Standard length of papers is 6000 words, but shorter contributions are also welcomed. They should be typed, double spaced on one side of paper with margins of 3 cm.
4. Two copies should be submitted (although one will be sufficient). They will not normally be returned, so authors should ensure they keep a copy.
5. Title, author's name, full address and brief biographical note should be typed on a separate sheet.
6. An abstract of 100-200 words should also be typed on a separate sheet.
7. Figures, maps and diagrams should be precisely and boldly drawn to permit photographic reproduction. Use single quotation marks (except for quotes within quotes).
8. Notes should appear at the end of the text. Referencing in the text should be as follows:
(Archer 1982: 157)
The recommended style of the bibliography is:
Archer, Margaret S. ed. 1982. The Sociology of Educational Expansion. London: Sage

Sayad, Abdelmalek 1984. 'Tendances et Courants des Publications en Sciences Sociales sur l'Immigration en France depuis 1960'. Current Sociology 32: 219-304

9. Edited word-processed copy will be sent to the author for checking, but proofs will be corrected by the Editor
10. Authors receive 25 offprints free of charge and may purchase extra ones if they order them when returning word-processed copy.

Institute of Sociology
Tian Xuan Soan Street
Hanoi
VIETNAM

Director: Tuong Lai

In recent years the Vietnamese society has experienced significant transformation from a traditional agricultural society into a modern one. To understand profoundly this long and difficult process of change, the Institute has focused its research on sociological problems posed by everyday life.

The Institute has focused its research on sociological problems posed by everyday life: the social structure of the Vietnamese society with the emphasis on understanding the formation and growth of cities in Vietnam, the disintegration of the traditional village system under the impact of urbanization and industrialization, changes in the norms and value system along with the transformation of the social structure, the impact of socio-economic and cultural factors on demographic behaviour and variables.

In addition to these projects, researchers of the Institute paid special attention to the problems of social policy, youth and their way of life, and family relations.

Along with its research activities, the Institute has been developing training programmes for other universities and colleges in Vietnam by sponsoring and conducting several courses in sociology (so far there have been no sociology departments established in the Vietnamese universities).

The Institute consists of five scientific departments: Policy and Social Structure, Personality and Way of Life, Population and Family Sociology, Theory and History of Sociology, Methodology, and two service departments: Information, Documentation and the Library.

Administration and Financial Affairs

Occasionally the Institute assists other social sciences organizations in conducting their research projects.

The Institute has its own regular publication, a Journal "The Sociological Review" (in Vietnamese).

Secretary: Vesna Gubovic

The Yugoslav Sociological Association (JPS) was established in 1954. Its founders represented a variety of social science disciplines: Oleg Mudjak, Boris Ziberic, Radovan Lukic, Fudr Sapak, Jovica Koric, Veljko Koric, and the others. The first President of the Association was Oleg Mudjak.

The 1950s were the years when the Yugoslav Sociological Association, as well as Yugoslav sociology started developing rapidly due to new social conditions resulting from industrialization and urbanization, economic growth (with its positive and negative consequences), self-management, expansion of higher education. In the 1960s Yugoslav sociology went through a kind of stagnation period, which was then overcome in the 1970s.

At present, the JPS consists of sociologists connected to the following 11 socialist republics and two provinces: Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, Slovenia, and Vojvodina. The members of the Association are composed of professional sociologists, but naturally its membership is open to any social science specialist. Currently, it has 1650 members, most of whom are employed in scientific institutions, universities, research institutions, or working in industrial sociology.

Main aims and goals of the JPS are defined in its statutes and program of activities. Its main tasks are: development of social science, especially sociology, in Yugoslavia; promotion of sociological research and implementation of its results.

Its main tasks are: promotion and improvement of professional qualifications of sociologists; coordination of their activities.

Its main tasks are: dissemination of information and exchange of experience among sociologists in Yugoslavia; organization of scientific meetings and regular annual conferences.

Its main tasks are: representation of Yugoslav sociology in the country and abroad as well as stimulation of international cooperation among sociologists.

The supreme body of the JPS is the Assembly, which convenes once in two years. The Assembly elects a president, vice-president and a secretary of the Executive Board. Other board members are representatives of the member societies. An Editor of the JPS journal "Sociology" is a president, and two delegates of the Research Council. Everyday activities

The publisher also publishes Sociological Abstracts and Sociological Abstracts Supplement. SA appears 3 times a year: June, August, October, December. There is also

"Sociological Abstracts" offers a collection of abstracts which reflects the world's social literature in sociology and related disciplines. Each of the five issues of SA contains the following:

1. Brief user's guide; a Table of Contents consisting of 33 major and 79 subcategories into which sociological subjects are categorized; a subject index; an author index; a source index; a supplement International Review of Publications in Sociology - consisting of a bibliography of books reviews taken from the journals abstracted in the same issue; some issues also contain Supplement(s) consisting of abstracts of Congress papers.

Selection and coverage: three types of journals have been distinguished in the following order of priority:

Type 1 - journals published by sociological associations, groups, faculties and institutes; and periodicals containing the word "sociology" in their title. These are abstracted fully, irrespective of language of publication.

Type 2 - journals from such related areas as anthropology, economics, education, medicine, community development, philosophy, statistics, political science, etc. Such journals are abstracted selectively.

Type 3 - journals from the humanities and journals of general circulation wherein scholars and laymen publish discussions or criticism of sociology and sociological topics. These journals are abstracted selectively.

SA desires to receive an abstract together with a reprint of the document itself (article, monograph, essay, book). Publishers and editors are urged to send copies of new publications for abstracting, or to initiate the preparation of abstracts on forms supplied gratis on request.

Other Abstracts and Publications Available:

- Information entered into the database since 1960 available online to information professionals from (file label SOCA), Data-Star (file label SOCA), Dialog (file 37)

- Sociosearch - a service offering researchers librarians an opportunity to consult with information specialists who answer research questions with comprehensive searches of SA and related databases

- Social planning/Policy, and Development Abstracts (SOPODA) - published since 1979 as a response to expressed needs of scholars and educators, for compression of the applied sociology and social science literature into an easily accessible form

- Note Us - a free newsletter to facilitate communication between the producers of SA and several thousands of users;

- A slide/tape show "Sociological Abstracts - Print and Online" offering information and instruction on use of this comprehensive sociological database. The presentation is available for purchase ($70) it can be borrowed for a two-week period, at charge.

- A manual - a free brochure - "Your Guide Searching Sociological Abstracts using a Personal Computer";

- The now completed first edition of the SA Thesaurus of Sociological Terms is being used to index all and SOPODA records; Dialog Information Services will mount the online thesaurus;

Subscription to SA is $ 325 per year. Single issues are $ 50. Orders and enquiries can be placed with:

of the Association between the meetings of the Assembly are supervised by the Executive Board and the Research Council of the JUS

The last XIII Assembly took place in 1987 and the current officers of the JUS are:

President: Nebojsa Popov

Vice-President: Milovan Mitrovic

Secretary: Vesna Gibovic

Board Members: Ivan Bernik, Ivan Cilic, Vesna Pesic, Mile Nenadic, Slobodan Vukicevic, Stefan Kostofski, Sagdaci Sanija, Esad Cimic, Laslo Sekelj, Vjeran Katunaric, Silva Neznanic
Research Council President: Laslo Sekelj

The Association's program includes activities of the following twenty sociological sections whose work is coordinated by the Research Council: methodology and statistics, urban and rural sociology, women in society, sociology of work, sociology of youth, sociology of leisure, social theory, sociology of public opinion and communication, sociology of law, sociology of religion, sociology of culture, social structure and mobility, social movements, sociology of social development and social planning, sociology of sport, social pathology, sociology of organization, sociology of migration, interdisciplinary cooperation

The JUS organizes, always in a different place, annual three-day scientific meetings whose themes are chosen by the Research Council and the membership. The attendance at these meetings ranges from 150 to 200 scholars who participate in the work of as many sociological sections as they wish.

Empirical research activities have been renewed in the course of the last two years thanks to the creation of the Consortium of Institutes of Social Sciences. The Consortium was founded in March 1985 by the Institute for Social Sciences of the Belgrade University, Institute for Social Research of the Zagreb University, and the Institute of Sociology of the Ljubljana University. The Consortium unites 35 Yugoslav scientific institutions and about 300 scientists and specialists. Currently a macroproject on the structure of the Yugoslav society is carried out by the Consortium. So far, four publications were sponsored by the Consortium. "Property" by Andrija Gams, "Heading for an Exclusive Society" by Mladen Lazic, "Social Inequalities" by a group of authors, and a paper on workers' strikes published in a journal "Sociological Review" (3/1987).

The themes of some recent conferences organized or/and hosted by the JUS in 1987 and 1988 were: Intelligence and Socialism; Development of the Yugoslav Sociology; Civil Society, State, Nation - commemorating the 200th anniversary of the French Revolution; The Future of Socialism: theories, practice, movements; Social Stratification in Slovenian/Yugoslav Society; Social Movements as the Force of Dealienation (jointly with the ISA Research Committees on Participation, Workers' Control and Self-Management, and Alienation Theory and Research); Social Stratification and Mobility in Comparative Perspective; Methodology in Social Sciences; Research of Public Opinion; Sociological Aspects of Education (Sociological Summer School); Cross-cultural and International Research; Theory, Methods, Projects, Organization (ISA Research Council); Theoretical and Methodological Problems of Structure Studies of a Socialist Society; Theoretical Pluralism in Sociology; Class Structure of the Contemporary Yugoslav Society; Prospects and Perspectives of the Yugoslav Society Development at the Turn of the Century".

Publications:

"Sociology" - an official journal of the JUS, published quarterly in Serbo-Croatian with abstracts in English. On the occasion of a World Congress of Sociology, Editorial Board prepares a special issue in English to provide a wider readership with some insight news on the Yugoslav sociology (last English issue: 1986)

"Sociological Review" - published four times a year by the Sociological Society of Serbia. It was started in 1938 as an annual publication, then it reappeared in 1961, and from 1964 has been edited as a journal devoted to research papers and analyses, book reviews. "Sociological Review" - published quarterly by the Croatia Sociological Society and the Department of Sociology of the Faculty of Philosophy, and the Institute for Social Research of the University of Zagreb.

"JUS-Information" - published three times a year by the JUS, contains news about activities, research program, JUS official reports and proceedings

In 1949, sociologist Gilberto Freyre, the author of "The Masters and the Slaves", then a Congressman in the Brazilian parliament, created the Joaquim Nabuco Institute of Social Research with a complex and challenging mission: to understand and rediscover both the Northern and Northeastern regions of Brazil. In 1980 the Institute became the Joaquim Nabuco Foundation (JNF), encompassing in its structure besides other sectors, the Institute of Social Research.

In order to understand the multiple factors involved in the socio-economic profile of those two regions, and with a view to help develop them, the development of a new international research programme entitled Human Response to Global Change (HRGC).

Fellowship Sponsor. International Development Research Centre (IDRC), Ottawa, Canada
Place of Tenure. The Secretariat of HRGC in Toronto, Ottawa

Availability. Applications are invited immediately and Fellowships may be taken up after April 1, 1988.
Value. The maximum value of each fellowship is $25,000 Canadian, including travel for the fellowship holder from country of origin to Canada and return, living expenses and all other costs properly considered the responsibility of the Fellows.
Duration: The fellowship is for a period of one year, in the first instance, with the possibility of renewal for a second year.

Applicants should be citizens of developing countries who can benefit from on-the-job training and experience and contribute to the development of the HRGC Programme. The fellowship holders will be expected to play a full and responsible role in the development of the HRGC programme, including participation in all the major Secretariat functions. This will include, but not necessarily be limited to:
(1) the organization and execution of international Secretariat functions, including liaison with governmental organizations (national and international), scientific unions and research institutes;
(2) the preparation of workshops, seminars and related meetings designed to identify research topics and research workers and to formulate research plans in international context;
(3) the preparation of studies and task forces on specific topics, including selection of participants, conduct of meetings, write-ups, editing, production and circulation of reports;
(4) the preparation of a state-of-the-art report on policy options in relation to specific and selected global changes;
(5) help in the preparation of a decade-long perspective and research plan to address problems of global change in the next century.

In addition to performing the above functions as determined by the needs of the programme, each fellowship holder will be asked to develop one or more research proposals that fit into the general context of the HRGC programme and which can be carried out under his/her direction upon return to country of origin.

Applicants are asked to write a letter outlining their interest in the fellowship and the HRGC programme. The letter should be accompanied by a full curriculum vitae and the names of three persons who would be prepared to write letters of references.

ISSC/UNESCO RESEARCH STUDY GRANTS IN SOCIAL AND HUMAN SCIENCES

The International Social Science Council (ISSC) in collaboration with UNESCO's Social and Human Sciences Sector has launched in 1986 a programme of Research and Study Grants in Social and Human Sciences for Third World specialists to facilitate their participation in international activities in these fields.

Awards are meant to encourage exceptional scientific ability. By giving such assistance to a selected few promising scientists from developing countries, ISSC and UNESCO hope to improve scientific excellence in the social and human sciences and their applications.

Applicants must be nationals of a developing country. They should be actively engaged in social science studies or research with some two or more years of research experience at the time of the application. They should be below the age of 40 at the time of the start of their proposed research or study visit abroad.

Applications should include a tentative budget. The funds will only allow for short-term fellowships. The grant will not cover family expenses.

Of greatest importance for the success of the application is the theme selected and the quality of the research or study proposal which must be attached to the completed application form. This proposal must give a detailed description of the research or study to be undertaken during the research or study period abroad and anticipated results. The candidate's opinion of the relevance of their research to the applicant's country or region is a justification for the applicant's choice of the Centre of Excellence abroad and an outline of the activities. The applicant intends to carry out following his return to his home institution in relation to the experience gained under the grant.

Letter of reference by at least two scientists who are familiar with the applicant's work should be sent independently to ISSC/UNESCO and to each Centre in social and human sciences (addressed below).

Applications should be sent to the ISSC either directly or through the affiliates or national academic institutions or research centres through the National Councils for the ISSC.

The complete application should be sent not later than 15 July 1988 to:

PREMIO EUROPEO AMATEI

The first European Prize for Sociology and Social Sciences will be awarded at the end of May 1989. This Prize, created in 1987 by the Sociological theory and Social Transformation Section of the Italian Sociological Association, will select each year the book or the article which in the course of the previous year has made the greatest contribution in Europe to sociology and social sciences. The Prize is under the patronage of several Italian universities, the European University of Florence and the Council of Europe.

Among the most significant works this year a jury of 115 sociology professors from various European universities completed a short list which will go to the Scientific Committee for the final decision on the prize. Members of the Scientific Committee are: A. Cavalli (Univ. Torino), F. Gerlich (Univ. Vienna), A. Giddens (Univ. Cambridge), G. Godelier (Univ. Barcelona), J. Israel (Univ. Lund), M. Malleson (Univ. Exeter).

THE ISA AND THE UN

On December 9 and 10, 1987, on the occasion of the commemoration of Human Rights Day, a consultation with NGOs (non governmental organizations) collaborating with the UN was organised jointly at the United Nations Headquarters in Geneva by the Office of the Director-General, the Information Service and the Center for Human Rights. Aside from presentations and ceremonies focussing on activities in the field of Human Rights, the consultation was devoted to a general examination of the cooperation between NGOs and the UN in the light of recent development as well as forthcoming events in various areas of activities. Particularly helpful to NGO representatives were guidelines provided by Ms. Raymonde Martineau, NGO Liaison Officer, on the consultative process, and information supplied by Ms. Thérèse Gastaut, Director of UNOG Information Services, on facilities offered to NGOs. The ISA was represented by Dr. Jacques Coenen-Huther (University of Geneva) who stressed the need for periodical exchange of information between the ISA and the various departments of the UN, with the aim of promoting research and studies at the international level. It is hoped that this meeting will lead to more diversified exchanges of views in the future.

Directory of European Training Institutions in the fields of Bilateral and Multilateral Diplomacy, Public Administration and Management, Economic and Social Development, has been recently published by the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR). This publication aims at being a useful and practical source of reference. One of its objectives is to identify those institutions with which the various bodies of the United Nations system could cooperate more closely and regularly in the future. There is no doubt that the Directory in its present form will contribute to better identify avenues of co-operation. One can hope, however, that further editions will include more collective members of the ISA. The ISA representative at the UN Office in Geneva, Dr. Jacques Coenen-Huther, could be instrumental in establishing a procedure to that effect.

The Directory is available in the sales section of the Palais des Nations in Geneva and at the UN Headquarters, New York (Sales number F/P.87.111 X DS/7).

NEWS FROM THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH

THE HUMAN RESPONSE TO GLOBAL CHANGE PROGRAMME

The Human Response to Global Change Programme (HRGCP) is a new international initiative, designed so as to analyse, understand, and evaluate human activities in the face of the rapid changes - specially environmental - occurring across the face of the earth.

The HRGCP has been designed so as to focus on the further - and perhaps more important - element in this complex array of global changes: the human activities which are in large part generating these changes.

The HRGCP will encourage and facilitate the study, management, and interpretation of the human causes of - and the options for - human response to the unprecedented stresses inherent in the current global situation. It proposes to initiate an innovative, interdisciplinary network of scholars, social science researchers, and those actively involved in managing human activities. This network will operate from a global perspective, but will concern itself with the local scale where many of today's global problems both originate and have their ultimate impacts.

The Programme will carry out its research through the decade of the 1990's and beyond. It will identify and promote research into the areas of global change which would most benefit from a better understanding of the social forces at work in their shaping and alteration. Many of the goals of the HRGCP are shared by the International Geosphere-Biosphere Programme launched by the International Council of Scientific Unions in 1986.

Progress to Date.

An Ad Hoc Preparatory meeting for HRGCP was held in Toronto, Canada in June 1987, at which time the International Federation of Institutes for Advanced Studies, the International Social Science Council, and the United Nations University, were designated as an Interim Steering Committee for the Programme. A Prospectus, entitled "Human Response to Global Change: A Prospectus for an International Programme" was prepared and sent out to interested parties and prospective donors.

Further meetings of potential participants and organisers were held through the fall and winter 1987. As a result of these meetings, a consensus was reached that the Steering Committee and its Secretariat will appoint a Scientific Committee for HRGCP, to plan and propose and screen scientific projects for the Programme. Specialised study groups, project teams, and task forces will be established in due course, under the direction of the Scientific Committee and with the advice of the Steering Committee and the Committee of Donors.

The process of developing public awareness and support for the Programme is now underway, and funding from possible donors and sponsors is now being sought.

In addition, it is expected that the initial steps will be taken in the organisation of Working Groups on special themes for the HRGCP. The interim thematic structure of the HRGCP is as follows:

1. Environmental History / Social History
2. Processes and Institutions
3. Methodologies and Values

Within this general thematic approach, more specific themes will be addressed, including such topics as global risk assessment, the analysis of complex systems, international policy conflict and cooperation, and the human response to the pending global climate warming.

JOURNAL OF THEORETICAL POLITICS

A new quarterly political science journal will be the official publication of COCTA (Committee on Conceptual and Terminological Analysis) and of PIPE (Policies, Institutions, Performance and Evaluation)-respectively, research committee and study group of the International Political Science Association. COCTA is also associated with the International Social Science Council and the ISA. Although linked to these organisations, the journal will retain editorial independence. Editors: Richard Kimber (University of Keele), Jan-Erik Lane (University of Umea) and Elinor Ostrom (Indiana University). The journal will be published by SAGE Publications.

The Editors invite the submission of articles and review articles on any theoretical topic treated rigorously and analytically. The policy of the journal will include an emphasis on publishing new theoretical work in accessible form for social scientists who are not mathematicians or logicians. Effort should be made to explain the substantive meaning of formal theories and proofs should be placed in appendices

Articles, which will be refereed anonymously by two independent referees plus one member of the editorial board, should be submitted to

MASTER OF ARTS DEVELOPMENT STUDIES

The Institute of Social Studies (ISS) in The Hague, The Netherlands, offers an M.A. in Development Studies programme for participants with a Bachelor's degree or suitable professional experience and/or training which is considered to be of an equivalent level

Application dates for the course starting on September 5, 1988 and lasting till December 16, 1989: Applicants who seek a fellowship from the Netherlands Fellowship Programme must submit their application to the Netherlands Embassies by 1st February 1988.

Applicants who seek a fellowship from other sources should apply by 2 May 1988 or 12 August 1988. Selections will take place within two or three weeks after these dates.

The ISS, founded in 1952 by the universities of the Netherlands, is one of Europe's oldest centers of development studies and has world-wide institutional linkages. The composition of its staff and student body is international. The main teaching activities of the ISS are an M.A. in Development Studies (with eight specializations) and a number of post-graduate diploma programmes. In addition to these, the ISS also offers a M.Phil. and a Ph.D. programme. Policy workshops, seminars and various other activities are held in The Hague and elsewhere.
